PREFACE

I HAVE treated in a former work¹ some of the questions of social history connected with the period of the formation of Common Law. In the present volume I should like to follow up these investigations into an earlier and more obscure period—into the eleventh century, which witnessed the definite settlement of the Danes, the overthrow of the Anglo-Saxon system, and the beginnings of Norman rule. Both the setting of problems and their treatment have to be different on this occasion from what they were in the book on Villainage. Instead of dealing with clearly formulated legal records and detailed extents of manorial possessions and services, we shall have to use chiefly the short, barren abstracts of Domesday Book, and stray notices as to legal customs and historical events. But, on the other hand, it is easier to form a view as to the relative influence and intercourse of the orders and classes of society, of the relations between the different functions of its life.

The central record of the study, the Domesday Survey, proved invaluable as a description, unique in history, of the state of a great country in the eleventh century, in the beginning of a new and momentous period in the life of Europe. However interesting and important early French Surveys, early German and Italian documents may be, they describe local and particular instances, while the Royal Inquest of 1086 stretches over all the social groups of a kingdom, and over the greater part of its territory. In a way, no better clue exists for the understanding of the machinery of mediaeval society at large, and for the appreciation of the relative importance of its constitutive elements. A thorough study of the record in its endless and exceedingly valuable details may be said to be a task set not merely to English historians and antiquarians, but to the students of the social development of feudal Europe in general.

And, for all its puzzling problems and difficulties, such a study presents a unique opportunity for concentrating materials and formulating explanations in regard to later and earlier periods of history. The antiquarian has constantly to go back to Domesday if he wants to trace to a definite starting-point local features or social institutions.

There is, of course, a 'beyond' even as to Domesday, but the safest way towards an apprehension of this 'beyond' lies through the Great Survey itself. The latter appears, in a sense, as the knot in which the threads of English social history converge from all sides, and we cannot wonder that the efforts of scholars should be directed above all things to loosening this knot in order to disentangle and follow up the threads. As a matter of fact, it is clear that no attempt to explain the rise of a landed aristocracy or the mediaeval agrarian system, or the influence of the Danish invasion, or the relative strength of the free and unfree elements of society can succeed unless the materials provided by the Domesday Survey are examined and accounted for.

On the other hand, it is not less important to analyse this material in the light provided by later and earlier facts. The Survey is primarily composed of abstracts from notes on early Norman and late Saxon conditions, and the clues to its terminology and statistics must be sought not only in indications provided by itself, but also in the evidence from English, French, and Scandinavian sources in its immediate neighbourhood. In a sense, the Domesday Inquest became a powerful factor of history ; it led to the definite registration of groups which might otherwise have remained in a rather floating state ; settlements of controversies as to tenure and status were connected with it. But the principal aim of the Survey was not to modify but to record, and therefore it stands in the closest relation to the age which precedes it. Difficult critical problems certainly arise in any attempt to interpret Domesday by the help of feudal incidents, or of Anglo-Saxon and Anglo-Danish terms, but both methods of interpretation have to be constantly used if we want to get at the realities indicated by the dry abstracts of the Survey itself.

One great question I have thought best to leave aside—namely, the rise of English town life. The authorities of the eleventh century, and especially Domesday Book, supply us with capital evidence on this point, but the trend of such an inquiry leads to intricate problems which seem to require a separate and exhaustive treatment. I thought it sufficient for the day to discuss the principal types of development in country life to which the greater part of the Survey and of other eleventh-century documents are devoted.

The importance of the subject and the wealth of information supplied by the existing evidence may justify my attempt to take up a study in which so much has been done by scholars of great name, and especially by one, the greatest of all, who has been lately taken from us. In a recently issued volume¹ I have tried to state my views as to the results achieved by their inquiries. My present work will be exclusively devoted to an examination of the evidence itself in as far as it treats of the eleventh century or, though coming from later and earlier sources, has a bearing on the state of affairs in the course of the eleventh century. It is to the terminological and institutional side of the inquiry rather than to the statistical and topographical one that my studies have been principally directed. References have been given rather fully in the hope that a selection of texts from original authorities might prove valuable, even apart from the argument, and would facilitate the task of testing this argument as far as it goes. .

I am greatly indebted to friends who have kindly read my proofs and offered many a valuable suggestion, to W. H. Stevenson, of St. John's College, Oxford, Professor C. Gross, of Harvard University, and F. Morgan, of Keble College, Oxford. I have also had, during my recent visit to the United States, the benefit of the advice of Professor Gay, of Harvard University, in regard to the first essay of this book; while Miss Toulmin Smith has taken great pains in revising the proofs of the second essay and of the Appendices. My secretary, Miss A. Sergeant, has rendered me most valuable assistance—among other things by compiling, under my direction, the tabular Appendices and the Index.

I am conscious of many shortcomings, but I hope that, whatever strictures may be made by critics, the work may yet be found to be a not superfluous contribution to a subject which is likely to supply generations of students with materials for inquiries.

INTRODUCTION

1. THE eleventh century seems a very distant time to us who are entering into the twentieth. It appears as a field for antiquarian speculations entirely devoid of practical interest. What can its study profit the lawyer, or even the historian, bent on tracing the progress of living institutions, on explaining the present by the past? And yet it does not require profound investigations in order to see that the eleventh century, like many other ancient epochs, still lays claim to attention, and that its study repays the labour of the scholar who turns to it. For a philologist, for instance, there could not be any question as to its importance: it is the time when the composition of the English language was definitely settled, when it was decided by history that it should become the characteristic mixture of Germanic and French elements which it has remained ever since. It may, in a sense, be said that English in its two-fold composition dates from the eleventh century.

Problems of the eleventh century.

And so does English law and English society. From the eleventh century most of the great forces of English history—royalty, the landed aristocracy, the Church, local institutions—proceed on their course of development through many a momentous crisis, but without substantial break. Before the eleventh century we witness the stunted growth of a Teutonic state which might have resulted in something more akin to the formation of Denmark or Norway than to that of England as it has come to be. The eleventh century may be truly called the watershed in the development of English society.

From the point of view of social and legal history three great problems are set, and to a certain extent solved, at that time.

The first stage is reached in the amalgamation of the Old

English and of the French elements brought together by the Conquest; the Scandinavian factor is reduced to a secondary place in the life of the country at large; the conditions for the growth of Common Law are prepared by the political centralization following on the Conquest. Of the third of these processes we shall have to speak when we come to treat of the fate of provincial institutions. It may be convenient to remind the reader now briefly of the general features of the first and of the second process.

Old

Very few words will suffice in regard to the relation between Old English and French institutions and customs, as this matter has been often discussed and cleared up in a more or less exhaustive way. Old English law was, of course, never abrogated and French law never introduced by a comprehensive enactment after the Conquest. English legal history does not know of a 'reception' of foreign law in the sense in which Roman law was received in Germany in the fifteenth century. The wergelds or compensations for homicide, the proof by the oath of a body of men swearing together, various customs as to marriage law and inheritance, &c., continued to exist and were frequently put into practice in royal, provincial, and local courts, more especially in those of the boroughs, where they have left deep traces in later times.¹

The Chancery of Norman and Angevin kings followed most closely on important occasions precedents supplied by the charters of Edward the Confessor and of Canute. King Henry II sent out a writ in 1155 to all the shires in which the See of Canterbury held land, to apprise the communities of these shires that the new Archbishop Theobald was confirmed in the possession of all the estates and liberties which his predecessors had received from foreign kings. The writ was bilingual, Old English and Latin, and contained an enumeration of social ranks, offices, and rights which would have been quite appropriate in the reign of Edward the Confessor.¹ The formula of the writ was evidently a standing one, and came to be repeated at the accession of each new archbishop: it does not vouch for the exact correspondence between the Anglo-Saxon terms employed and the social facts of Henry II's reign, but it illustrates in a forcible manner the continuity of legal tradition.

Turning to Domesday Book, we find that the whole complex of rights acquired by the French conquerors on English soil is determined in a sense by Old English law. The Norman lord usually got his title and claimed his rights on the strength, not of separate and express grants, but of a general assignment of all the titles and rights that had been possessed by his Saxon predecessors, of everything that had been held in a particular place by Godwin or Edric or Aslac T.R.E., that is, at the time of King Edward.² Hence we come across constant references and contests in regard to rights derived from occupation and ownership in Old English law. In a word, substantive Old English law passed from the time of the last Anglo-Saxon kings to that of the kings of the Norman dynasty, and continued in use in a variety of relations, especially in local custom.

And yet French law was imported wholesale and put into practice in every sphere of life. The classification of persons according to their status, legal procedure, police responsibility and punishment of criminals, military tenure, land-ownership and seisin are at once affected by views and rules French element.

Scandinavian element.

2. It is more difficult to estimate the influence of Scandinavian customs on England. They have been to a great extent hidden from view by their amalgamation with the body of Anglo-Saxon law. From the point of view of the French conquerors they were local varieties of the complex of legal rules which used to be included in the general designation of the Confessor's laws. And yet it is interesting to notice that there is a distinct stream of Scandinavian principles and practice running through this preconquestual legal lore. We can distinctly trace a time when there were two great bodies of law in concurrent use in England: Scandinavian customs in the Anglo-Danish half of the country, roughly speaking in England north-east of Watling Street, and more purely Saxon and Anglian customs and legislation in what may be termed, for want of a better word, the Anglo-Saxon half of England, south-west of Watling Street. It is more difficult to ascertain the particulars of the first case than those of the second, because the Danes and Norsemen were even less literary people than the Angles and Saxons, and their peculiarities are more often referred to than described.¹ Yet some characteristic features may be made out with sufficient clearness. They disclose on the one hand a great similarity in the general conceptions of justice and social order between Scandinavians and English, and, on the other, these general conceptions receive in many respects a peculiar treatment. It is worth while to look a little closer into these questions of the Scandinavian elements of preconquestual law, as their examination may prove useful later on, when we come to investigate the social differences between the Anglo-Danish and Anglo-Saxon provinces.²

Scandinavian influence is clearly traceable in some points of judicial organization and procedure. In several of the towns where the Danish settlements were especially strong, in Lincoln, Stamford, Cambridge, Chester, York, we find a peculiar Scandinavian legal institution, the lagmen, sometimes under that very name, and sometimes under the designation of iudices. In the Scandinavian countries the lagmen, the lögsögumaðr, are legal experts of high social standing, who have to lay down the law before the popular court, either in connexion with particular cases as they come up,

² The principal contribution to this study has been made by Steenstrup in his volume on the 'Danelag'. Professor Alex. Bugge in his recent book on the Vikings has also called attention to several interesting facts. Both authors, especially the latter, exaggerate perhaps the amount of direct loans from the Scandinavians, and treat the subject to some extent in a strain of retrospective nationalism. Many traits which are considered as peculiar to the Danes and Norsemen appear in truth as a close parallel to older Teutonic customs. Some curious misunderstandings are produced by these nationalistic prepossessions, as e.g. when Professor Alex. Bugge contends that serfs were of higher rank than the villain in the south-west of England, because they happen to be mentioned first in some of the surveys of the shires in Domesday Book (Vikingerne, ii. 322). But the general trend of these inquiries goes in the right direction, and leads to interesting points of view. The study of Anglo-Danish civilization has been too much neglected, and therefore the copious material presented by Domesday in this respect has not yet received an adequate treatment.

or in a systematic series of statements or lectures.¹ It would be impossible to prove that the function of the lagmen in England was differentiated in the same way from the ordinary jurisdiction of a judge. But it is clear that the town judges in question do not hold their commission from the king, and are not elected members of a popular tribunal. Their office is a hereditary one, and there is no exact counterpart to it in the purely English portions of the country.

The standard number of lagmen seems to have been twelve, and this observation leads up to another Scandinavian institution of considerable interest, namely, to the twelve senior thanes of Æthelred's law enacted at Wantage in 997. This group of twelve thanes appears in two of the clauses formulated by the Witanagemot. In cl. 3 they have to come forward in the court of every wapentake and to swear on relics that they will not accuse wrongly any innocent man or conceal any guilty one.² In cl. 13 it is enacted that if the thanes come to a unanimous decision, it should stand; if they are divided, that opinion should be accepted for which eight have voted, while the members of the minority incur a heavy fine—each six half-marks or two pounds.³ The full quorum meant in this second case is evidently one of twelve as in the first, although the enactment requires somewhat more than an absolute majority for the validity of a sentence—eight and not seven. The idea of fining those who took a different view is not strange from a barbaric point of view: those who are overruled are assumed to have pronounced a wrong judgement, and are fined accordingly.

Indictment procedure.

The most interesting feature of the Wantage enactment is, however, the provision about the oath of the twelve

thanes. It has been pointed out that we actually catch a glimpse here of the indictment procedure regularized in 1166 by the Assize of Clarendon.¹ On the other hand, the partisans of a derivation of the grand jury from the Inquest of Normandy and Carolingian France have given a more narrow interpretation to the action of the twelve thanes: it has been taken to establish the personal status of accused persons in regard to the ordeal spoken of in cl. 4 and following. It was of great importance to settle whether a particular person was of good or bad repute, as the ordeal in the latter case was much heavier than in the first. Brunner thinks that only this preliminary settlement was entrusted to the twelve thanes, and that the indictment jury led by the twelve 'most lawful men' of the hundred as regulated by the Assize of Clarendon has nothing to do with the laws of Wantage, and is derived from Norman-French precedents.² It seems to me that this is emphatically a case when the growth of an institution has to be traced to different roots. The continuity of the Frankish and Norman inquest procedure may be considered as fully established in regard to England by Palgrave and Brunner's studies. But this does not preclude that in preconquestual England itself there had existed legal customs which prepared the way for the indictment jury of the twelfth century. The leading men of the wapentake, to judge by the Wantage enactment, were called up to point out persons who had to be accused of crimes, and to settle the conditions under which they might undertake to purge themselves of the accusation. The tenor of cl. 3 is too general to admit of a restrictive interpretation bearing merely on the character of the ordeal: it speaks of innocence and guilt, and not of repute, and the quorum of the twelve thanes appears later on as responsible for the sentence. Nor is the remarkable coincidence with the twelve lawful men of the Clarendon Assize, on the one hand, with the twelve lagmen of the Danish boroughs, likely to be fortuitous.¹ To be sure, the verdict of the senior thanes was not final; it could be reversed by successful ordeal, but even so the verdict of the grand jury is lacking in finality: from the legal point of view in both cases we have only an indictment before us. In a vague way some elements of such a procedure on the strength of the opinion of the authoritative, the leading, men of a district may be said to have existed in the Anglo-Saxon shires as well. At any rate it is quite clear from records of late Anglo-Saxon pleas that the decisions were formulated in the county and probably in the hundred court by the leading thanes, and not by the community of the suitors.² But, of course, this only shows that jurisdiction was assuming in pre-conquestual England an aristocratic basis. The Anglo-Danish practice led to a definite differentiation of ranks, and to a concrete development of the institution of senior thanes and lagmen wielding an authoritative supervision over the criminal police of the district. The Anglo-Norman inquest provided the last link for the formation of an indictment jury empannelled for the purpose of formulating indictments, and capable of collecting information as to supposed guilt. If the Norman-French inquest had not supervened, the Scandinavian procedure might have easily taken the shape of the establishment of presumption by an aristocratic board. If, on the other hand, the Scandinavian element described in Æthelred's enactment had not found its way into English practice, the Frankish inquest would have hardly assumed the definite form of indictment on the strength of the opinion of authoritative knights.

The decisions of the Witenagemot of Wantage seem altogether to have been an attempt to legalize the position of the Danes in their English settlements, and to sanction their legal arrangements. Besides the clauses already mentioned we find a very characteristic enactment that witword and lahcop and landcop and lahslit should stand.¹ This evidently applies to Danish customs quite as much as the disposition about the holding of wapentakes applied to Danish district courts. The *lahslit*² is the Danish counterpart of the Anglo-Saxon bót, witword is explained in Anglo-Saxon dictionaries as applying to testaments and bequests, but the word is a peculiar and well-authenticated Northern term made out to mean a legally allowed claim,³ more especially the right to vindicate ownership or possession by one's affirmation under oath; and there does not seem to be any reason for seeking another sense for this peculiar expression in Anglo-Saxon documents.⁴ Both lahcop and landcop appear in the enactment under discussion in a specifically Scandinavian form (lag-kaup, landkaup); the Old English would be lahceap and landceap, and this latter actually occurs in charters.⁵ The buying of law implied by lahcop can hardly mean anything else but reintegration to one's legal status after the payment of a fine similar to the later amercement or misericordia. As for landceap, the term establishes the practice of alienation of land by purchase. It is corroborated by mentions elsewhere, and is interesting as marking a stage in the history of the transfer of land, originally hampered by the right of the kindred or mægth. This particular point is curiously illustrated by some notices about the transfer of land in the Anglo-Danish county of Northamptonshire, showing that the main features of purchase and tradition were the confirmation of the validity of the transaction by festermen (sureties), and occasionally by public courts.⁶ This evidence does not only come from a province deeply permeated by Scandinavian influence, but it agrees in fundamental points with the legal customs which obtained in Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and Iceland.

Criminal law.

One more feature of Scandinavian influence to which I should like to call attention is the characteristic treatment of some crimes from the point of view of moral reprobation. While older Anglo-Saxon law as well as other 'Leges barbarorum' considers crime mainly as a tort, and dwell on compensation, prevention of feud and atonement for breach of the peace, the idea of punishment for a moral wrong finds its way mainly through the influence of the Church, which considers crime primarily as sin. There is a second channel, however, provided by the conception of honour of military societies. To fly before the enemy, to forsake one's companion or chief, is estimated to be mean, dishonourable, unworthy of a warrior, and this factor of reprobation in connexion with a certain code of conduct appears clearly in the legislation and legal lore of the Anglo-Danish period.¹ One of the results of this new departure is the appearance of a group of misdeeds which are described as nidingsværk.² Quite apart from the material consequences of his doings, from the amount of havoc brought about by them, a man may be pilloried as a niding, a mean fellow, because the crime imputed to him is unworthy of a warrior. To kill an enemy in strife, to burn his house, are not the acts of a niding, although it may lead to very unpleasant reprisals and eventually to heavy compensation. But Swegen, Godwin's son, for the kidnapping of Earl Björn, was declared a niding.³ The moral standard introduced in such cases testifies to an important progress in criminal law, but it is intimately connected with the life of a class—the military class of the Scandinavian invasions. The sentence on Swegen was pronounced by the assembly of the here, and we know from other sources that stringent rules of discipline, professional honour and justice, were formulated and enforced by the military associations of Scandinavian warriors. The company of the Jomsvikings in Pomerania, from which the Thingemannalid of Canute is said to have sprung, was closely knitted by comradeship, and developed very strict rules of conduct. The same may be said of the Thingemannalid or Vederlag of the Anglo-Danish kings themselves.¹ Altogether the military association evidently played a great part in holding together and organizing the Scandinavian invaders and settlers in England. The ties of kinship, though very powerful and elaborate in their homes, were not well adapted for their organization abroad, as people of different kindreds and even races were very much thrown together in the campaigns in foreign parts. One other characteristic feature may be noticed in this connexion—namely, the rise of armed guilds in Anglo-Danish England, corresponding very closely to similar bodies in Scandinavian countries. The guild of the Cambridge thanes² finds its best counterpart in the guilds of St. Olaf in Norway, and other organizations of the same kind.³

On the whole, a study of conditions in the north-eastern provinces of England reveals everywhere traces of the legal and social influence of the Scandinavian race. The institutions more particularly at home in this territory are, as a rule, akin to those which obtained in the south and west, but often present sharper outlines and find their parallel not so much in the conditions of the manorialized south-west of the eleventh century as in the more primitive Anglo-Saxon institutions of the ninth and the tenth. Anyhow, in our further studies we shall have to be careful not to slur over the fundamental dualism of preconquestual England, and to attend to the variations produced by it in the aspect of legal custom and of economic arrangements.

work.

3. I have to add a few words about the general scheme of the present book. I should like to analyse the principal legal institutions of the age in their bearing on the constitution of society. Law is always closely intertwined with the business interests, the economic forces, the social intercourse of the age: the aim of law is to regulate them, and at the same time, the development of law is to a great extent dependent on these very business interests, economic forces, and social intercourse. In a broad sense legal history is an aspect of social history, and it is from this side that I desire to approach it. I shall try, firstly, to examine the decisive political factors of social life and to trace the influence of public law on society; secondly, to examine the economic factors of social life and to trace the influence of husbandry and of private law in as far as it regulates husbandry; thirdly, to examine the classes and groups produced by the combined working of political and economic causes, and to trace the main features of the laws as to personal status under which these classes live. In connexion with this general plan I shall divide my volume into two essays—one treating of society in its relation to government, the other treating of land-tenure and the classes settled on the land, as the principal elements of economic organization in the eleventh century.

As to the first essay, a few preliminary remarks may not be amiss. When we speak of government and political organization we are naturally led to think primarily of the institutions by which public authority is represented—of kingship, parliament, the courts of justice, the officials, local government, &c. But when it is not so much the political machinery itself as its action in social life that has to be studied, a different treatment of the subject may seem appropriate. Instead of the anatomy of the commonwealth we may attend to its physiology; instead of the structure of the political body its functions may be made the subject of observation. We shall have to speak of institutions to some extent, but let us chiefly look at the work they were doing, at the social problems they had to solve.

From this point of view a primitive government like that of England in the eleventh century has to face mainly three great questions which continue to play an important part nowadays, but are complicated by ever so many other issues. The three tasks this rudimentary government had to master were—the defence of the country, the maintenance of order and justice, and the providing of the means of existence for government by means of taxation. Military organization, jurisdiction, and taxation will have to be discussed in their relations to social life.

GOVERNMENT AND SOCIETY

SECTION I: MILITARY ORGANIZATION

systems.

I. PERHAPS the most general feature of political organization, a feature common to all its varieties, however widely they might differ in other respects, is the necessity of a public force of some kind. Tribes and cities, savage hordes, feudal society and modern states, in as much as they are united against outsiders, and claim independent existence, have to provide, in one way or another, for an armed host. But, of course, this host may be arranged on very different lines: it may be the people in arms, or be recruited from a class of professional warriors, or consist of bands of trained mercenaries. In any case the system according to which the commonwealth carries on its armaments cannot but exercise a potent influence on the whole constitution of society—it may lead to social equality, or to the predominance of the armed few, to the endowment of soldiers with land, or to the sway of a plutocracy supported by hired armies. The central centuries of the Middle Ages in England present us with at least three main varieties of military organization, comprising further subdivisions. There was the hereditary aristocracy of feudalism based on land endowment; there were bodies of professional soldiers acting as mercenaries and household troops; there were the national levies of fyrð and here gathered on the personal or on the territorial basis. All these distinct systems overlapped a good deal, and may be said to have co-existed during the greater part of the period. But the epochs when each of them was predominant are easily distinguishable, and the contrast of the conceptions underlying them is so great that they may be considered separately from the institutional point of view.

As is well known, mercenaries were often employed both before and after the Norman Conquest. We need not treat in detail of the hiring of Flemings and French soldiers, nor of the levies of mercenary troops on English soil, outside the ordinary course of feudal service.¹ Although these expedients played a considerable part in the military history of the times, their social importance is not great. They did not lead to the formation of new classes, and did not alter materially the development of existing classes, at any rate in the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries. But some features which throw light on the economic basis of military service, and its material value in these times, have to be noticed shortly in a work treating of the relations between government and society.

soldiers.

The hiring of soldiers was always, to a great extent, matter of special agreement; conditions and pay must have varied greatly. But in spite of these fluctuations, the frequent use of mercenaries tended towards the establishment of certain rules and common standards; it may be said that there was a certain medium price of the commodity in the market. We find 8*l.* a day to be the allowance of a fully armed knight in Henry II's time,² and this is maintained, on the strength of ancient custom, as the normal rate in the thirteenth century in the case of fully armed horsemen.³ This explains why, under ancient assessment, scutage was computed at two marks per fee; this sum corresponds exactly to the wages of a knight for the usual forty days.¹ Later on scutage gets increased to £2 a fee, but this is easily explained, partly by its being treated more as a convenient exaction than as an equivalent for actual service, partly by the gradual rise in prices, and, consequently, in wages. Extant evidence on the customary allowance of fully-equipped armed men before the Conquest applies, in connexion with the prevailing military system, to foot soldiers. According to the Berkshire custumal, one man was sent from five hides, and received 4s. from each for two months, which would be 4*d.* a day.² The provision for the host assembled by William Rufus at Hastings in 1094 would amount to 3*d.* a day, if a service of forty days was reckoned upon, or 2*d.* if the original outfit was made for two months.³

Another feature of interest in connexion with our data about the daily allowance for military service is the transition which they sometimes indicate between the inconvenient short terms of obligatory service and the subsidizing of armed forces by the king. One of the main objections against the feudal arrangement of the host was its liability to disperse after the performance of its forty days' service. Hired soldiers, although they cost more, were a better tool in the hands of a commander, not merely because they were likely to be under better control, but also because they were engaged, not for six weeks, but for longer periods, e. g. for the year. This is undoubtedly an important feature of contrast between the two systems. But there were intermediate links between the two which explain, to some extent, why the passage from the one to the other was so easy. In the case of the Welsh expeditions, for instance, and for the defence of castles, a common expedient was to call up a man for a short period of compulsory service, say fifteen days, or eight days, and to keep him afterwards at the cost of the king.¹ By this method valuable 'cadres' of English men-at-arms were kept ready for the formation of contingents of hired soldiers.

As the cases quoted apply to military duties which were organized long before the French conquest—for instance, the frontier defence against the Welsh—it is to be surmised that many of the instances described in records of the feudal age may have gone back to preconquestual origins; they are at any rate clearly distinguished from ordinary Norman knight service, both in terminology—they are technically serjeanties—and by the unusual terms of service. There are, besides, direct indications of the hiring of mercenaries during the Old English period.²

The beginnings of the English naval establishment are particularly characterized, as in the case of other nations, by the employment of experienced sailors from abroad. The 'pirates' used to man King Alfred's galleys in his memorable attempt to meet the Vikings on their own element were mostly Frisians, if we may judge from the list of casualties in their first fight with the Danes.³ In 1012 forty-five ships of Swegen's fleet broke off from the rest, and made a bargain with the Unready King, in his sore plight, to keep the country against its enemies, on condition that the crews should be fed and clothed.⁴ The agreement was evidently made, not with single seamen, but with the entire seceding squadron, and later agreements were entered into on the same principles with Scandinavian ships. In Canute's reign a squadron of forty ships was kept up after the disbanding of his here, and this proved to be the beginning of a Danish standing fleet in the king's pay, which served under Canute and his successors.¹ Its crews of professional seamen, lidsmen, were clearly distinguished from those of the ships manned by national levies,² and exerted a great deal of political influence.³ The men received eight marcs a year per oar, or about $3\frac{1}{2}d.$ per day.⁴ The reckoning per oar was the common estimate of a ship's fighting crew in Scandinavian parts; it comprised all able-bodied seamen who eventually turned out as soldiers, but did not extend to attendants.⁵ The allowance of $3\frac{1}{2}d.$ per day was a liberal one, as we may judge by comparing it with the provision made, some 150 years later, in Richard I's reign, when only boatswains were paid $4d.$ a day, while common soldiers received merely $2d.$ ⁶ The considerable depreciation of money during the interval between these dates renders the advantage in favour of Canute's, Harold Harefoot's, and Hardacanute's sailors even greater. On the other hand, it has to be said that the seamen of the Danish kings were considered quite as much land warriors, had a harder military task before them, and enjoyed correspondingly greater consideration, while by Richard I's time the services had become more specialized. However this may be, the Danish standing fleet dwindled with the decrease of Danish influence in the state, and under Edward the Confessor the agreement was gradually dissolved, the remnant of the ships leaving England with their gains.¹

A similar case is presented by the well-known standing guard of the English kings in the eleventh century. While after the Norman conquest no considerable corps of that kind was kept, and the kings were merely surrounded by personal followers in varying number, the huscarls of Canute, Edward, and Harold were a powerful standing division, which constituted the backbone of the army.² To judge from Northern analogies, they were mercenaries in the sense of having made a definite bargain with their sovereign, and their position was not unlike that of the Danish fleet while it existed. They were picked professionals, gathered and kept together as a standing military force, and living at the expense of the sovereign whom they were serving. Members of this guard were occasionally employed on administrative errands, as, for instance, the luckless two slain in Worcestershire while gathering the geld for Hardacanute,³ but they were detached in such cases from their chief duties, for obvious reasons, as men enjoying special trust from the king, and likely to serve him well on occasions which demanded courage and authority. We hear sometimes of grants of land⁴ to huscarls, and most of them were probably rewarded sooner or later in this way for their services; but again, it was not as landowners that they were important, and no definite conditions were attached to their tenure of lands. It merely supervened as a fitting sequel to a life in the king's household.⁵ At the outset they were recruited mainly among Scandinavians—Danes and Norsemen, and although in time the force came to include English as well as Danes, its organization was framed according to the Scandinavian pattern.¹ The Domesday Survey has preserved some traces of payments made by boroughs for the maintenance of huscarls; they are not large—ranging from one mark to two in the four Dorset boroughs.² The description of Malmesbury shows that a similar payment was made there for feeding ‘buscarls’, who seem to be seamen-warriors of the same kind as the lidsmen, and to correspond to the huscarls of the land-army.³ An interesting trait of this Malmesbury notice is that the payment for the maintenance of the mercenaries is exacted when the citizens of the borough do not take part in the king’s host. Where the Malmesbury record has buzecarlos, the Colchester one has soldarios. The first of these terms is generally assumed to refer to sailors—buzucarls,⁴ men from ‘busses’, in the sense of boats of a special construction. This derivation rests chiefly on the supposed connexion with the O.N. buza (buss), and if we accept it, the expression will have to be explained on the pars pro toto principle: mercenary soldiers would be called ‘boatsmen’ because many of them had served in the fleet. As, however, neither the Malmesbury nor the Colchester entries nor the references of the Sax. Chron. aa. 1052 and 1066 point necessarily to seamen,¹ another derivation may be suggested, namely, from O.N. boð—order, command.² Budscarls would be 'men under command', an explanation which seems to give at least as good a sense as the received 'boatsmen'. In any case the buzecarls of the Chronicle appear more in the light of mercenaries forming the garrison of Hastings and Sandwich than of disbanded sailors. And this meaning of garrison troops would go far to explain the fact that only boroughs are charged directly with a special rate for the feeding of buzecarls and huscarls.

The attempt to organize standing mercenary troops on a large scale failed when the Danish settlement broke down as a leading political force. The mercenary bands of the Norman and Angevin periods were casual combinations of men, and never assumed an importance similar to that of the Thingemannalid or the Danish garrisons in the towns. The social basis for the mercenary system of the eleventh century was provided by three conditions which could not be kept up in the same way later on: the existence of a race of professional warriors, their unsettled, migratory habits of life, and a governmental policy of providing maintenance and cash to dangerous soldiers in the way of tribute or of pay. All these conditions were removed by the amalgamation between Norsemen and English, and by the French conquest. Society settled down on the basis of land tenure, and natural economy superseded for a time the 'cash' system which had ruled the relations

Is the mysterious 'busones comitatus' of Bracton, f. 115, and of the Placitorum abbreviatio, p. 85, connected in any way with buzecarls? It would be hardly possible to trace any relation between the influential leaders of the county and 'boatsmen', but perhaps easier to recognize in the buzzones king's vassals supposed to lead the county. The term would be similar to the designation of the knights of the shire.

2. Mercenary and feudal troops had to be used because they were specially efficient according to the needs of the time, but neither the first nor the second were ever considered as the unique kind of military array. Even during the feudal period national levies¹ stood behind them, in spite of the predominance of the aristocratic class. And as for the centuries before the Conquest, it is the fyrd and the here that present the fundamental institutions of the Old English and of the Scandinavian army systems. In the eleventh century both terms begin to be employed for the same thing—an army summoned by the king, on the strength of the general principle of national allegiance, might be called here, even if it were composed of Englishmen, or fyrd, though it were levied in the Scandinavian provinces,² but, originally, the distinction between the fyrd as the English host, and the here as the enemy's army, the Danish host, is clearly established and consistently kept up.³ Both the ultimate combination of the terms and their original difference carry weight, and are explained by historical conditions. After the definite settlement of the Danes, and their subjection to the rule of the king of England, there was not much difference between the levies of Devonshire and those of Nottinghamshire or of Yorkshire. More people would probably be liable to be called up in the northern provinces than in the south of the island, but this was a matter of social organization and not of principle.

These institutions which became similar in the eleventh century are described in strong contrast to each other in earlier times. The here may be said to be properly an army which occasionally took to pacific pursuits, while the fyrð was a nation which had to rise occasionally for warlike activity. The character of the Danish raids, the sudden movement of the heathen squadrons and corps, the erection of temporary fortifications, the 'horsing' of the Vikings, are too well known to require any special comment. I will just recall to the memory of my readers the general impression left by the descriptions of the Chronicles, the helplessness of the cumbersome arrays of the shires when they had to oppose their swift and reckless enemies—they are mostly too late, they look for the invaders in the south when their adversaries appear in the north, they collect in the west when they ought to be in the east.¹ The reason is not far to seek; it lay, not so much in the ability of the Norse leaders or in the warlike superiority of the Vikings, as in the social character of the force opposed to them. On some occasions when the shires are called out, the summons to the fyrð is spoken of as the summoning of the whole population.² The general array is described distinctly as a gathering of the country people, in which the better thanes form only a minority.³ It is needless to dwell on the difficulties of bringing together such a host. We come across notices telling that a king had to harry his own dominions, in order to punish the population for being remiss in obeying such summons.¹ When the fyrð had been gathered it had to be fed, and this again turned out to be no easy matter. Unless the defenders of the fatherland resorted to wholesale pillage of their own country, as they sometimes did,² the commissariat question was a difficult one to solve. We do not hear much about food provided by the government. The usual expedient was to oblige every soldier to take food and money with him, but this could not last very long, and sometimes divisions of the fyrð had to be sent home, or dispersed of their own accord, because provisions were failing.³ Not much could be required in the way of equipment from men summoned in this way. Occasional ordinances show, however, that measures were taken to maintain a certain, very moderate, level in regard to the offensive and defensive weapons of the men of the fyrð in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries—a bow and arrows, or a spear, or a hatchet with a shield, were deemed to be necessary even for militiamen of the lowest degree.⁴ The Bayeux tapestry affords an insight into the armament of the bulk of the English fyrð at the time of the great crisis of 1066:

Cf. Vincent, Lancashire Lay subsidies, 69.

many of the men mustered by Harold were armed with mere clubs.¹ These cumbersome levies consisted in part of very poor people, who were badly fitted out for warlike expeditions and encounters, and their main value in a fight lay in numbers. These were not small, as we may judge, for instance, from the levy of William Rufus in 1094, about which there was certainly exact information: 20,000 men, infantry, were collected for an over-sea expedition, and they were certainly picked men, better equipped and provided for than emergency levies for the defence of home shires would have been.

From what social classes were these militiamen drawn, Full fyrd. and what was the reason of their low military standing? In exceptional cases the militia array may have included all able-bodied men of certain districts capable of wielding a weapon of any kind, without distinction of class. I suppose that a 'Landsturm' of this kind was called up for the protection of the hearths of the folk in a literal sense of the word. It may not be safe to take the expressions, 'the whole people,' or 'all the country folk', very strictly, but there is weighty though indirect indication of the general character of such levies in the fact that they appear under the leadership of the parochial priests. Such was the array of the northern shires against the Scots in the campaign which ended with the battle of the Standard,² and similar levies en masse must have been resorted to in earlier times against the Danes. A parallel is afforded on the Continent by the so-called 'retro bannus' (arrière ban), in which the parish communities (communitates parochiarum) were collected under their priests.³ It is on such occasions that the men with pitchforks and flails of whom the Chronicles sometimes speak were brought up—evidently peasants who neither kept nor used weapons in ordinary times, but were gathered to meet a desperate plight.¹ However this may be, although the English language did not know of any special term to distinguish such gatherings from the regular fyrð, they cannot be considered as normal, or summoned according to usual regulations.

In its widest customary sense the fyrð was an array, not of the whole able-bodied male population, but of representatives of all the households of the country. In Henry III's time, at any rate, an Ordinance of Arms exacted the possession of proper equipment for militia service from every independent householder who could be rated for the possession of chattels worth over 20s. Inasmuch as the qualification was drawn from property in movables, the Ordinance did not apply to every man of free birth; sons living with their parents and people devoid of independent means would not be affected by it.² Thus one of the most important mediaeval checks on governmental pressure becomes apparent: the royal administration was not able to set up a purely personal standard. It had to concentrate its efforts on the unit of the household, partly because it had to reckon, not merely with men, but with equipment, and partly because it would have been impossible to get at all the free male inhabitants of the kingdom: the days of the poll tax had not yet come. The other limitation—free condition—is indicated indirectly, as, according to feudal law, the chattels of serfs would be deemed to belong to their lords.¹ But the freedom demanded in this case has to be taken in the widest sense of personal freedom, and not in the higher tenurial sense, because, otherwise, the number of men liable to be called out for service in the militia would have been very small in some parts of the country. A free man holding in villainage would come under the Ordinance if he had an income or chattels of his own. In fact, the principle of the estimation could hardly have been different from that which obtained in the case of parliamentary and ecclesiastical subsidies assessed on the basis of movable property.²

I do not think that this way of treating the militia array is to be considered an innovation of the Angevin period. On the contrary, it may be said to revive and to carry out in a consistent manner a principle admitted all through by the older organization of the fyrð. The national levy was emphatically the host of freemen, and in serious cases, apart from the exceptional emergencies already mentioned, it must have included representatives of all the free households of the country. The fyrð hosts of the shire, of which we hear so often in the history of the Danish wars, cannot have consisted merely of the men selected on the principle of one soldier for every five hides, or for every medium-sized borough. The armed crowds spoken of in the Chronicles, and depicted on the Bayeux tapestry, do not look like trained regiments of picked men, nor does one see what the Berkshire fyrð or the Devon *fyrð*³ as a troop of some 300 or 400 men could have done against the Vikings who were harrying their shires in 860 or in 997. In 991 there was a desperate battle at Maldon between the

In the writ for the collection of a fifteenth in 1225 there is a distinct exemption in regard to the arms of villains, 'as to which they have sworn,' an evident reference to the arms which they were bound to keep by the Assize. fyrð of Essex and the here led by Olaf Tryggvason. The latter represented the crews of 390 ships, that is, not less than 15,600 men, on the average of 40 men per ship. The picked men of ealderman Byrhtnoð may have numbered on the five hides' standard some 530 men. The Norsemen must have left part of their men on the ships, but nevertheless, the disparity would have been too overwhelming, unless the Essex fyrð mustered en masse on this occasion. If the expression 'all the country folk' cannot always mean the entire male population, it surely means more than the array of the holders of five hides and of representatives of borough units. The summons for home defence was directed in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries, to all the free ceorls of the district, and in the yet earlier times of offensive warfare the same may have been the rule in regard to all expeditions. The laws as to attendance at the fyrð do not make any other difference between freemen than as to the mode and amount of punishment in case of non-appearance. The simple freeman is fined 30s., and the landowner, that is, the owner of boc-land, or of land of corresponding quality, loses his estate.¹ The common freeman in this case was incontestably the ceorl, and later on the compulsory service in the militia had to be extended to villains, inasmuch as they were descended from ceorls; no other rule would fit the case of the southern counties as they are described in Domesday. The main idea of the ceorl's obligation is tersely expressed, just before the Conquest, in the famous dictum—he is fyrð-worthy, moot-worthy, and fold-worthy.² We must confine our attention at present to the first of these qualifications.

As a matter of fact, however, the attendance at the fyrð became very early a burden of land-holding. If in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries it was not every person, but every independent householder, who could be assessed for service in the militia, because some independent property was necessary to carry out its injunctions, even so in the ruder conditions of the Old English age the duty of serving in the host necessarily fell chiefly to the lot of those who held land, and occupied a definite place in society. Landless men could not be sought out and looked after; in the natural order of things they had to range themselves behind the holders of land—the landowners or the men settled and rated under their authority.¹ And this administrative aspect of the situation was corroborated by the economic one; a man without a firm hold on a unit of husbandry, represented by a tenement, could not meet the expenses and requirements of the fyrð in regard to equipment, food, and necessary loss of time and labour. It was not merely as a fighting man that he had to appear on the scene, but as a self-supporting householder, and the fyrð had to be considered as much from the point of view of the drain on his resources as from that of personal prowess and possible bodily danger. In accordance with this, we find that the duty to serve in the fyrð is spoken of as one of the normal incidents of land-tenure.² The reservation as to the trinoda necessitas almost invariably accompanies any disposition in regard to landownership. And the original idea seems to have been that every hide should send one fully equipped soldier to the fyrð. The hundreds were taken to be equivalent to wapentakes, because they presented the common form of district organization for army purposes. All through the Germanic world the hundred appears as the group of 100 holdings, meant roughly to provide for the maintenance of a company of 100 soldiers.³ But this standard could not be kept up. On the one hand, holdings were broken up in different ways, yardlands and oxgangs getting to be the regular allotment of many households, while sometimes the free tenants were possessed of plots of irregular size and varying quantities. On the other hand, there arose many larger estates as combinations of several hides. And, what is even more important, it became impossible to perform the ordinary fyrð service, in frequent expeditions and in proper equipment, on the basis of a tenement of one hide, without help from outside. The coat of mail and the horse acquired more and more value from a military point of view—one as a means of defence in the hard struggles with the Danes, the other as a means of quick locomotion. Well-forged helmets and swords were scarce and very expensive.¹ Altogether, the difference between a well-armed warrior and a militiaman with indifferent equipment grew more and more important. This led ultimately to the formation of a professional force of knights and sergeants-at-arms, but it led also to changes in the scheme of the fyrð expeditions. The same reasons which produced the Lombard Assize of Arms of King Ahistulf, and the graduated service of Charlemagne's armies,² secured the transformation of the fyrð from a general force of free tribesmen into an array of specially selected warriors. Some of the customs followed in this respect have been preserved by Domesday Book and one or two Saxon charters. The Berkshire arrangement is the clearest,¹ but there can be no doubt that it coincided in its main lines with similar arrangements in other counties. It was based on the principle that only one man per five hides is bound to go to the war in case of a royal expedition, and that a sum of 4s. per hide has to be provided for him for two months' service. The Malmesbury and Exeter entries² confirm the statement by alluding to the normal service of one soldier per honour of five hides.

In regard to the sea-fyrð, we get the additional information that although the crew of a longship was provided on the principle of one ship per 300 hides, which would require, on the average, one fully equipped oarsman per five hides, the ship being reckoned at sixty oars, the proportion of men with coats of mail was smaller, only one being required from eight hides.¹ These enactments are very important, and require some comment in several particulars.

Social aspect of the fyrð.

To begin with, if what has been said above in regard to home defence was right, the king's expedition, which is sometimes spoken of as the expedition par excellence, cannot have meant every case of the calling out of the fyrð. The retro-bannus has to be distinguished from the bannus, special summons for home defence must have been kept distinct, in one way or another, from the convocation of the fyrð for external service, and as such external foreign service, not only expeditions over the sea, but also mobilizations involving service in distant parts of the country must have been reckoned. The Carolingian monarchs treated the obligations connected with the call of the host very differently according to the place to which the army had to go; men from Aquitaine or Brittany were not sent out to Saxony on the same conditions as Austrasian Franks.² Some rules of the same kind must have been observed in England, and in regard to service in the marches of Wales or of Scotland, it is known that local levies were summoned in a special manner.³ The difference in the summons was, however, to a large extent a matter of administrative practice and political consideration. Should the king choose to use the expedition as a means of extortion, either in harassing small tenants, or in exacting unusual

The second point to be noticed is the fact that the array of picked men was turned out by the shire and its hundreds, and not as a mere consequence of feudal dependency. This feature will have to be considered again later on, but I would like to call attention to it now because it is material to the constitution of the fyrð. The great landowners holding estates rated at multiples of five hides might follow their own method in providing the contingent incumbent on them, and make subinfeudation the means of holding these contingents in readiness. But in the Old English fyrð system the apportionment of the service according to five-hide units was not feudal in itself.¹ Small landowners would have to club together in order to fit out the representative of the unit, exactly as in the Lombard and Carolingian instances, and there are traces of such combinations of several participants for 'defending' estates from the fyrð, especially in the case of coheirs.²

The outfit money cannot be considered in the Berkshire entry as a substitute for actual service—4s. a hide have to be provided anyhow, whatever the holding of the man who actually went may have been. Perhaps he held three hides out of the five, and therefore he had evidently to find himself three-fifths of his expenses. On the other hand, the man acquitting the fyrð obligation may have been possessed of half a hide only, and in this case his neighbours evidently had to provide 18s. for his maintenance. As for the personal duty, there must have been special agreements or customary rules of rotation.

It remains to be said that the five-hide unit appears very large when compared with Carolingian practice, where four, or even three 'Hufen' usually went to make up the picked soldier's unit. It is difficult to say exactly what the reason for such a contrast may have been. Four Hufen are not much more than one hide, and yet they were deemed sufficient on the Continent, for a number of years, to support the army in the course of most frequent, protracted and arduous expeditions. Several grounds may be suggested, but it is difficult to make a choice between them, and perhaps no choice ought to be made, as, very likely, both the reasons to be mentioned acted concurrently. There is a difference in the epoch to begin with—the outfit of 1066 was more elaborate and costly than that of 800. Although horses were already employed in Charlemagne's armies, especially in his scaræ or picked troops, the decisive turn towards horsemanship was taken in the Danish wars, when the 'horsed' Vikings had to be caught up and pursued by riding divisions, and the five-hide unit probably included provision for one or two horses. The more intensive system of cultivation and more active economic intercourse may also have contributed to put the Frankish five Hufen more on a par with the English five hides. Anyhow, there the unit is, and its formation affords a most important landmark in English history. It is a sure sign that the social foundation of the old army establishment—the status of the small free householder, provided on the average with a hide—was entirely inadequate to meet the altered requirements of the art of war and of military organization. A unit five times as large grew up as the natural basis for the man-at-arms in the national array of the tenth and eleventh centuries. One might say—using political expressions with some caution—that the more ancient democratic arrangement had to be replaced by an aristocratic one, although the tradition of the earlier system continued to assert itself in great emergencies.

I have been speaking all along of the fyrð, as we are The here. better acquainted with the particulars of its social organization. But by the side of it stood the here, the Scandinavian host; of the doings of this latter we hear more than enough, but we are not so well versed in the details of its internal organization. The main features are, however, made clear enough, partly by scraps of English evidence, and partly by comparison with the institutions of Scandinavian countries.

There can be no doubt that the here lost very gradually its character of a host of rovers; it was exceptionally mobile, living by violence and loot, holding on more to its skiffs and fortified camps than to the fields and estates of the country around. Even when women and children appear as natural impediments of the here, they are easily concentrated in the camps from which the raids start.¹ True that the eleventh century discloses the here already in a comparatively settled state. If we did not know from the Chronicles how little time had elapsed since the great disturbances after the death of Canute and Tostig's rebellion, we might think while reading Domesday that the Danes and Norsemen were fixed to the soil quite as firmly as the Saxons and Angles. And yet Domesday shows on every page a state of things in the half-Scandinavian shires which stands in sharp contrast with the condition of the rest of the kingdom. I shall have to call attention again and again to this contrast, but now, in connexion with the here, it is necessary to notice that the predominance of small freemen, which was a thing of the past in the Saxon south, is the rule in such Danish shires as Lincolnshire and Leicestershire, or in Norfolk. It is clearly seen to give way slowly before the southern system in Nottinghamshire, Derby, Northamptonshire, Huntingdonshire, Bedfordshire, and Cambridgeshire, and has been disturbed only by the material consequences of a war of extermination in Yorkshire. The agrarian and legal meaning of this fact cannot be approached as yet, but in regard to the military problem it may be said that the aspect of a here recruited from the Danelaw provinces by Harold and Edward the Confessor must have resembled much more a Saxon fyrð of the seventh and eighth centuries than one of the eleventh century. The five-hide units had not yet been formed in the Danelaw ; its shires were yet bristling with small fighting freemen, and it is only by the fresh history of the here that the standing and occupations of these people can be explained. Men holding oxgangs, or tofts, or a couple of assessment acres, which could not have represented large tenements in any case, appear emphatically free, can often go where they please with their land, and are connected with superior authorities by the slightest forms of subjection known to the feudal world. It is evident that they were full members of the here, a quality which, from being a privilege, was getting to be a grievous burden. It is evident also that most of them could not have supported their households, even in the most precarious manner, without resorting to manual labour, and it is not likely that they could have kept up their privileged position, for economic reasons, even if the Norman Conquest had not supervened. Anyhow, there is no trace of the five-hide rule of service in the north, and in view of the peculiar constitution of society in those parts, it would have been difficult to frame or to enforce it.

Yet some rules of rotation in regard to service in the fyrð must have obtained there too, as it is not likely that the northern people should have submitted to a much heavier share in the military organization of the king's expeditions after their definite settlement. What these rules were we are unable to say.

Scandinavian customs.

It may not be superfluous to notice here some of the customs referring to military organization in Scandinavian countries. Although it would be impossible to argue from the details of Danish, Norwegian, and Swedish arrangements in the twelfth or thirteenth centuries to the particulars of English customs of the eleventh century, yet the repetition of similar features in the case of all the three principal branches of the Scandinavian race strongly suggests that the main foundations of military institutions go back to very ancient customary rules. I will call attention to Danish practices as presenting an especially suggestive parallel.¹

There is the same fundamental distinction between home defence and warlike expeditions as that noticeable in England: priests and serfs are emancipated from the last, but not from the first. Home defence was understood in the narrow significance of fighting for one's own land, one's provincial fatherland, not for the country at large. The common militiamen ought to have been armed at least with the ordinary weapons—spear, iron cap, and shield—but, as a matter of fact, the lowest stratum of the home defence array was formed of men with clubs. The leding, corresponding to the regular Old English fyrð of the eleventh century, was organized on a territorial system, and its normal conditions were settled for service at sea, although the land expeditions, for example those for the defence of the Danewirke, the great wall, against the Germans and Slavs were evidently arranged on similar principles. Naval service was based on a division of the country into districts bound to man and arm one ship each, and the tenants of land were combined for the purpose of sending armed men to this, in such a way that each tenant, or group of tenants, possessed of land of the value of one 'mark gold' sent one warrior oarsman every three years. The ordinary longship was built to carry from forty to sixty oarsmen. The men called up by rotation to the leding had to take provisions for sixteen weeks with them, and to collect this outfit all the householders forming the hafnae, the section assessed at one mark, had to contribute. A certain number of warriors, equipped with coat of mail and some horses, were appointed to each ship according to customary rules. On the whole, the obligations of the leding are based on the main assumption that the bulk of the population is composed of free men who are able to combine, in order to put forth a considerable national army. Feudal relations are not excluded by the leding, but they are subordinated to it. According to a computation drawn up for the time of King Valdemar I (about 1200 A.D.), Denmark is said to have been able to send out 1,400 longships to sea, with a total of 160,000 sailors, of whom 1,400 were fully equipped knights, and 1,400 archers. This enumeration applies evidently to the supposed number of householders entered in the hafnae sections, but not to the sailors actually mustered. These would amount, roughly, to one-third of the whole population registered in the hafnae, reckoning at about forty men per longship. At this rate the number would still be a very handsome one—between fifty and sixty thousand. It seems as if, in the case of Norway, the crews of the ordinary leding fleet of 309 ships made up about 14,000 men, but that a full complement of some 40,000 could be mustered in case of great emergency.¹ Without pretending to solve the many difficulties connected with these data, or to start special investigations in regard to them, we may rest content in noticing the general result, that the countries which, century after century, had sent out crowds of warriors to the west, were still able to muster powerful squadrons on the principle of a territorial repartition of military obligation among free householders. Nor is it less significant that all the main expedients employed in the case of the fyrð were represented in Scandinavian practice, with the fundamental difference that what had become an antiquated militia system in England was still the groundwork of military organization in Denmark in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries.²

FEUDAL SERVICE

I. THE principal feature of feudal society is, of course, ^{Systems of} the system of interdependent fiefs burdened with various ^{fiefs.} military duties. Instead of shifting agreements between contracting parties—a sovereign as employer and soldiers paid or maintained by him—there arises a hereditary relation between lord and man on the basis of tenure. The system is not an artificial contrivance, but a spontaneous growth : it ensures stability to the military requirements of the chiefs of society, and it provides maintenance to soldiers in the shape of a landed estate, the most usual and convenient form of economic organization in those days of natural husbandry. Nothing less materialistic and tangible would have done at a time when social intercourse and political views were restricted to a very narrow horizon ; nothing less obligatory and regular could have satisfied the needs of a society assailed on all sides by invaders, pirates, rioters. The duty of military service was not only a necessary element for the constitution of a host, it was recognized and employed as a tie between the separate units of the political world. The various obligations springing from the tenure of the knight, attendance in the lord's host, wardship, marriage, relief, &c., were comprised under the characteristic term of 'foreign service', forinsecum, distinguished as such from all other varieties of tenurial dependence.¹

There was not much to choose, on many occasions, between socage tenure and fee-farm, and there were many controversies about the actual treatment of the one or the other tenement as a frank-fee or a socage holding, but it was always held in Anglo-Norman common law that 'foreign' service stamps the tenement as a military fee, or a serjeanty akin to it, and that all other incidents ought to follow this main distinction. The root of the doctrine lay in the fact that, historically, socage tenure proceeded from an older stratum of law than the feudal one, from a stratum in which relations between individuals depended on the rules obtaining in wider social groups, the kindred, the hundred, the tribe, while military tenure formed an individualistic unit joined to the rest of society by the contractual tie of foreign service.¹ The socager was bound to perform military service when called up to the fyrð, while the knight served his forty days on the strength of a 'real' obligation laid on his estate; the minor heir of a socager came under the guardianship of his kinsmen according to general considerations of affinity in blood and of economic solidarity; the guardian of a tenant by foreign service was his lord, interested in the adequate mensuration of service, the rules as to inheritance, investiture, marriage, wardship, were elaborated in the provinces of North-Western France before they came to be applied in the England of the Norman and Angevin kings, and bore fruit hundredfold in the field of English common law. We shall often have to attend to the results of this incorporation of French feudal law on its civil side. But their legal importations were not the effect of a 'reception' of legal principles and authorities. They came with a reorganization of actual military institutions. And as we are concerned now with knights' service, which presents, as it were, its backbone, let us note that it was introduced as an efficient factor on the very morrow of the Conquest, as soon as the victors of Senlac came to divide the spoils of the vanquished and to arrange the conditions of their permanent settlement on the soil of Great Britain. Again and again we hear of the continuous tradition of titles to knights' fees, and of the different usages connected with them from the age of William the Conqueror.¹ It is not merely the case of establishing pedigrees and proving descent, but of tracing and formulating feudal custom, defining rights, settling the amount of contributions and the size of contingents. The appeal to continuous tradition was not vague rhetoric expressive of the feelings and wishes of parties rather than of their judicial claims and arguments; military tenure was created and perpetuated by ceremonial acts more than by written documents, and it received its definite shape from actual occurrences more than from stipulated clauses.¹

We know from the comparison of the returns of 1166 as to the number of knights' fees held from the different baronies, that there were three kinds of knight service at that time: that from the old fees (antiquum feoffamentum), created in the reigns of the three Norman Kings, that of the new fees (de novo, novum feoffamentum), instituted after Henry I's reign, and that of the knights, not enfeoffed with particular estates, but maintained on the domain of the barony. The first and third category were drawn together in respect of the feudal obligations of the barony; they represented the original service due from it, its 'servicium debitum'. The second category arose from the policy of subinfeudation carried on by the barons on their own account, and had nothing to do with the original 'due service', but Henry II asserted a right to exact military service or its substitute, scutage, and the other eventual privileges of an overlord in regard to these fees constituted in excess of 'due service', as well as in regard to the original fees. We need not dwell longer on these cardinal facts, as they are very clearly set forth in the evidence, and have been sufficiently recognized of late.

Nor can it be doubted that the original repartition of military duties was not the product of a well-balanced scheme, of a summing up of the capacities of different estates to support more or less knights. It was the result of a rather haphazard distribution of estates by the king according to his personal views, and perhaps according to rough bargains with his chief followers.² The Saxon

Chronicle tells us of the arbitrary manner in which estates were confiscated and granted away in 1067,¹ and there is no reason for supposing a more regular procedure on other occasions. Guidance was provided by the principle that the Norman stepped into the shoes of a Saxon 'antecessor', and therefore the proprietary conditions of preconquestual England reacted to a great extent on those of the new settlement, but the combinations of estates were modified and recast on all sides, and the process of endowment of tenants-in-chief was certainly not guided by any careful investigation of the resources placed at their disposal. The case seems to have been similar to that of the division of Ireland into baronies under Henry II, when definite contingents were assigned to the barons who took part in the Conquest, without any reference to estimates of revenue or area.²

The only trace of a regular and conscious plan which Mr. Round is able to make out in the distribution of the fees is their grouping according to combinations of five knights and ten knights. It happens seldom that the number of knights assigned to a barony does not represent some multiple of five, and we find the same to be the case in the Duchy of Normandy. This calls for an explanation, and a plausible one seems to be provided by the military organization of the feudal array in Northern France and England: it is subdivided into 'constabulariae' of ten knights each.³ Naturally enough, there was a tendency, in forming baronies, to assign to them the duty of maintaining and equipping such combinations, or simple fractions of them.

If the method of rating was to that extent imperfect and superficial in regard to the barons with whom the king dealt directly in introducing the new military organization, it seems idle to try to trace any system or rule in the repartition of duties between the subdivisions of a barony.

Recent investigators have been led to adopt this view, and to reject all theories as to a normal knight's fee. This point is, however, so important that we cannot refrain from subjecting it to a renewed examination. After all, it does not necessarily follow from the loose adjustment of military service to baronies that there were no average types of single knight's fees. It was possible to enfeoff magnates without looking very closely to the military capabilities of their possessions, but difficult for the baron to go beyond certain limits in carving out fees for his knights. Just because the knight's fee was the lowest unit it seems probable, a priori, that there were definite views as to its approximate value. And it would be exceedingly material to know what estate was considered as the minimum outfit for a fully equipped knight. In view of the prevailing importance of knight service and of the growth of a military aristocracy in connexion with it, typical estimates of knights' fees would allow us to draw certain boundaries between classes of society, and to explain indirectly some of the processes which led to their formation. But, of course, all statements in this respect must be based not on a priori speculations, but on matter of fact evidence.

Irregular
fees.

We possess a good deal of evidence as to knights' fees in the shape of the Testa de Nevill lists, of Kirkby's Inquest, of the various returns published as Feudal Aids by the Record Commission, of the Inquisitions post mortem, &c., and, at first sight, this evidence is most disappointing. Irregularities and contradictory data meet the eye everywhere, and our keenest inquirers have given up the search in despair.¹ How can one try to ascertain the size of knights' fees when, for example, the three abbots of Peterborough, Abingdon, and Ramsey are assessed at sixty, forty, and four knights' fees respectively? Surely their possessions did not differ in such a ratio, or anything like it? And then, we often hear of the number of hides that go to a fee, but these vary almost for every place; there may be 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 10, 14, 18, 24, 48 hides to a knight's fee.

Nevertheless we may trace, as it seems to me, some guiding principles in the midst of this confusing variety, if we do not insist on absolute regularity and are content with looking for standards and prevailing types.

In instituting our search it will be advisable to leave on one side the frequent cases when mere fractions of fees appear before us, and it is impossible to reconstitute the units broken up into these fractions.¹ The parcelling of fees was the complicated result of divers causes. To some extent it was produced by casual dismemberment in the process of hereditary succession—namely, in the case of absence of heirs male and devolution to coheirresses.² Even more common was dismemberment by subinfeudation. If the baron had to create knights' fees in order to meet the obligations of military service incumbent on the barony, the single knight, or the holder of a few knights' fees might find it convenient to strengthen his military outfit by enfeoffing dependent tenants holding fractions of fees, and bound to co-operate with him in the performance of his service. In the marches of Wales and of Scotland the direct connexion between feoffment and military duties was made especially evident by the frequent calls to resist invasions and to join in punitive expeditions.³ Then again one has to reckon with the fact that ordinary donations and sales often assumed the shape of subinfeudation in the period preceding the statute 'Quia Emptores'. When we hear of a man holding one hundredth part of a knight's fee it need not mean much else but that he was possessed of some six acres of land for which he had to render homage and fealty, to pay scutage according to proportion, and eventually to submit to the exercise of certain rights of wardship and marriage.¹ Altogether it would be an idle undertaking to attempt to trace the motives underlying the exceedingly complicated cases of subinfeudation.² One thing is clear, however, to any one who has looked at them more or less carefully, namely, that it was by no means the plan to divide the whole area of England into fees, or, to put it in a different way, to parcel up each barony into a certain number of subordinate fees, a process which would have put an end to the existence of the barony itself.³ As a rule, a large margin was left to the baron, and sometimes, especially in ecclesiastical baronies, only a small portion of the land was carved out as military tenures. It is advisable to consider the simpler cases when fees are mentioned as unbroken units, or when their fractions are expressly combined into units. What values or agrarian quantities do they correspond to, and is any system to be traced in the assignation of these quantities or values?

Two baffling expedients must be noticed from the outset. Knights may be quartered on the demesne of a barony instead of being endowed separately, as we know from the charters of 1166.⁴ The characteristic provision is added that each baron maintaining knights in domain should be bound to hold coats of mail and arms in readiness for them, and probably there occurred cases when equipment was provided, not only to such of the knights as were settled on the baronial domain, but also to those who were less well-off among the military tenants.¹ The second circumstance which prevents us sometimes from forming an estimate in regard to the economic basis of knights' fees is the imposition of service on a whole district or a complex of estates, with the remark that all the holdings of the territory in question should contribute to the maintenance of knights, in proportion to their size.² On such occasions the duty is spread, as it were, over a whole area, and it is impossible to ascertain what was the minimum or the average necessary to support one knight.

But in the vast majority of cases we get definite apportionment of knights' fees to certain estates, or equations between military fees and units of value or holdings. These, of course, are the cases which are to be studied with special attention.

A certain presumption in favour of the view that there was a tendency to consider knights' fees and even baronies as approximately equal units may be drawn from the fact that the reliefs to be paid on change of ownership were fixed at constant sums. The relief of a baron was put at £100 in the earlier reigns, but gradually reduced to 100 marks, while the knight's fee was charged at 100 shillings.¹ As the baronies, at any rate, were very unequal in value and importance, the interest of these figures lies in the relative importance of the knight's fee and the barony as expressed by their contrast. The barony was deemed, in a general way, to be worth more than thirteen, or even twenty times as much as an ordinary knight's fee. The language of the documents sometimes indicates clearly that the knight's fee was considered a unit of value from which estimates of income could be deducted, or to which they could be superadded.² It has been supposed that the 100 shillings relief corresponds naturally to a fee of the value of £20 a year, and there are in fact traces of such an estimate of the fee.³ This estimate appears appropriate in Edward I's time, and we actually find attempts to render it general.⁴ But before this time instances of an income of £20 from the fee are rare.⁵ In Henry III's time the official estimate amounted only to £15.¹ The inquisitions of Henry III's reign applied, of course, not only to actual tenants of knights' fees, but to all those who were considered capable of undertaking the burdens and honour of knighthood. But for the purpose of ascertaining what the common 'census' of a knight was, it is quite as relevant as if it had contained lists of actual knights. In Henry III's early years the standard was still lower, or rather was expressed in lesser figures. We find, namely, in the Close Roll of 1230 an Ordinance of Arms enacting that every knight or person possessed of chattels of the value of 15 marks has to keep a coat of mail (lorica), while tenants of half a knight's fee, and owners of chattels of the worth of 10 marks are bound to have a 'haubergel'. The chattels mentioned are evidently intended to correspond to the marcatae and solidatae of income in other enactments.² In Henry II's Ibid. 209 (Hampshire): 'Rogerus de Sascy tenet l libratas terrae in Derttone et Sumborne per feodum i militis.' But so do fees of very small value. Bracton's Note Book, pl. 1182: 'Agnes de Wahulla tenuit de Dom. Rege in capite in Wahulla iiii carucatas terre cum pert. que valent per annum xlii libras, in Brocbergo iiii carucatas terre cum pert. que valent per annum xii libras, et in Langfordia quam Robertus Anquillun tenuit in dotem ii carucatas terre cum pert. que valent per annum xl libras. Servitium predictorum maneriorum nesciunt separare, quia tota baronia de Wahulla integra respondet Dom. Regi pro xxx militibus.' However, for a medium, we may say that £20 a year represents the normal estimate of a fee in Edward I's reign.

App. II: 'qui tenent xv libratas terrae.' Cf. Lib. Rub. ii. 582: 'Dominica quondam eiusdem honoris (Bolonie) Traynge in Hertfordscira, valet lx l. ² Close Roll, 14 Hen. III, m. 5 d., p. 398. It seems strange to speak of the value of chattels where otherwise estimates of income appear. But it must be remembered that the Assize and Ordinances of Arms merely provided for the keeping of arms, and not directly for service. In the case of a merchant or a socman it was sufficient to ascertain that he was possessed of chattels to an amount which enabled him to buy a coat of mail or a 'haubergel', while in the case of the knight, an estate and an income were necessary as the basis both of equipment and of service. The ordinance of Henry III establishing well-known Assize of Arms of 1181 we find the same appreciation, the upper degrees being expressed by two distinct forms of knightly equipment: the coat of mail of a full knight is required from possessors of 16 marks' worth of property, and the lighter armament with a haubergel has to be provided by those possessed of 10 marks income. Thus if we take the standard of value in movable property or of income, it is not a unit of 20 librates, but two units of 16 marcates and 10 marcates respectively¹ that we shall have to accept as representing a larger and a lesser fee, a more complete and a lighter knightly equipment. Before taking leave of the Assize of Arms I would like to notice that it evidently contains a more adequate expression of custom than the Ordinance of Henry III's time. The latter attributes, namely, the haubergel equipment to holders of half-fees; but this can only be an attempt to stretch the military requirements as far as possible and, indeed, further than the estimates taken as a basis warranted. Why should possessors of movables of the value of 10 marks be considered equivalent to tenants of half-fees, the whole fee being estimated at 15 marks value? And was the haubergel outfit really equivalent to only one-half of the full knight's armament? It seems evident that the original intention was by no means to reduce the value by a half, but to ensure the equipment of heavy and of lighter men-at-arms, standing to each other in the ratio of 16 to 10 marks. Whether this valuation should be reduced even more for the £15 standard for knights' fees, and the parallel between actual fees and assessed chattels make it almost certain that the 15 or 16 marks corresponded to a knight's average income.

Although attempts at valuations in money were thus in actual use, it is much more common to find knights' fees estimated in territorial units. In the thinly populated north-west we may come across a vague reference to so many villis constituting a fee.¹ In most cases a certain number of hides or carucates are reckoned to a fee.² There are some cases where fees are assigned to such small divisions of the territory that it is impossible for us to make out nowadays by what means the necessary knight equipment and service could be kept up. I mean, of course, cases where there is nothing to show that the deficiency in quantity was counterbalanced by some exceptional features, in point of quality, which rendered the estate valuable. It may be supposed that there were some special conditions in the tenure of the fee; for example, help from the lord in regard to equipment.³ In other cases the small estates are distinctly considered as an

The great majority of extant notices of the contents of knights' fees fall into groups, the repartition of which is not only the result of statistical abstracts, but corresponds to types indicated in the sources themselves. One main distinction is evident at first glance; there are great fees (magna feoda) or ordinary fees, and small fees (parva feoda, minuta feoda).⁴

Small fees. The small fees are also generally called fees of the honour of Mortain (Mortaigne, Moriton), and most of them are derived from the fief of the Count of Mortain, the brother of the Conqueror,⁵ or from fiefs which have grown out of it,⁶ but it is not always the case. Some of them are drawn from other honours, e. g. from the fief of Arsyk, cut out of the possessions of Odo of Bayeux, and those of the barony of Stafford.¹ Conversely by way of exception there were some large fees of the honour of Mortain.² The frequent mentions of scutages and reliefs due by such 'parva feoda' in contrast with the ordinary ones show that a very material inequality was assumed between the two types. For example, when the ordinary fee paid a pound for scutage, the small fee paid a mark, that is, two-thirds, and the reliefs differed in the same proportion.³ In many cases the proportion is not quite so simple: 16s. 4d. for the Mortain fiefs corresponds to two marks (26s. 8d) for great fees, 200d. to 320d. Thus the endowment of a Mortain knight was taken to equal five-eighths of the endowment of an ordinary knight,⁴ and this seems to have been the most exact estimate, although, not unnaturally, some local variations did occur.¹ Now these figures strike us at once by their exact correspondence to the two grades of knightly equipment mentioned in the Assize and Ordinances of Arms: the holders of the fees of the 'smaller shield' evidently correspond to the men-at-arms who have to appear in lighter armour² and are rated at £10 or 10 marks when the fully equipped knights are rated at 15 (or 16) pounds or marks.³ Thus the contrast is by no means a casual one, but is based on the quality of the service. It is perfectly natural that a horseman serving in light armour should be required to pay a lesser scutage than a fellow of his who had to appear in a heavier and more costly equipment. His day must have been valued only at 5*d.* instead of 8*d.* And, further, it is clear that the difference in equipment and service was meant to correspond to a difference in the size and value of the estates on which the service was imposed. In regard to duties there is an emphatic distinction between large fees and small fees, and we hear of additional grants of land intended to make a small fee as complete as a large one.⁴

Are there any express indications as to the normal size of a fee, and as to the reduced size of a small knight's fee? There are certainly traces of a view according to which five hides ought to go to the fee in the hidated districts, that is, in the south of England.¹ By the side of these equations must be placed numerous cases where the proportion approximates to this estimate without fitting exactly, cases of allotments of 4-7 hides.² Other combinations are much less frequent. value of these very rough estimates will appear when we compare the figures for the southern counties with those of the Danelaw and of the north of England. We get into an entirely different scale of numbers. Fees of five carucates are exceedingly rare.¹ A rather common estimate in the Danelaw seems to be 13 or 14 carucates to the fee, but the numbers often range from 7 to 16.² In the north 24 is not uncommon,³ and we actually get in some few cases to 48.⁴ Yorkshire presents in many respects interesting peculiarities. It contained a good many estates which had belonged to the Count of Mortain, but they were not parcelled out into small fees. The Mortain fee, in the special sense in which it is used in the south, does not exist here. As for the ordinary fees, their composition differs very much in the same wapentakes, but the several honours follow systems of their own, and keep them up rather strictly. The Honour of Skypton in Craven, for example, forms its fees of 14 carucates each; in the fief of Albemarle both this and the 16 carucates standard occur side by side, while in the Earl of Lincoln's possessions 10 carucates go to the fee.¹ How is the striking difference in the composition of the knights' fees to be explained? It corresponds so clearly to the ancient division of the kingdom into the Anglo-Saxon part of the kingdoms of Wessex and Mercia, and the districts occupied by the Scandinavian invaders, that one is naturally brought to consider this contrast from the point of view of the differences of social structure and political history of these two parts. On one side we have the strongly manorialized south, with estates of large land-owners already formed before the Conquest; on the other we find a heterogeneous mass of tenures in which the small freemen still play a great part. Even when this free character is somewhat obscured, as in Yorkshire, by the tremendous devastation of the struggle in the eleventh century, it is yet clear that before the Conquest it could hardly have presented a very different aspect from the neighbouring Lincolnshire. The fundamental difference between the compact estates of the south and the numerous free holdings of the Danelaw could not but exert an influence on the introduction of the feudal military system. In the north it had to stretch over larger areas as a rule, not only in the literal sense of occupying larger tracts of country, but also in that of drawing its supplies from larger congregations of tenants and larger combinations of holdings, because the single tenants and holdings were subjected to much more superficial exploitation. At the same time the system took more the shape of a regular repartition of service between the component units—the carucates of

The character of knight service in the Danelaw, and the difficulties it had to encounter, may be well illustrated by some entries taken from the Lincolnshire feodary of the Honour of Richmond. The fees have actually to be taken over in some cases by entire communities of sokemen,¹ and the feudal service thus loses its characteristic aspect of a personal contract of vassalage. Altogether, the very varied conditions of tenure in this county, as well as in those of East Anglia, are reflected in the feodaries by exceedingly irregular formations of the knight's fee. It is clear that the feudal system did not come as a natural growth in these places: it appeared prematurely as a consequence of the French Conquest.

In the south matters are exactly the reverse. Not only are the different villages comparatively rounded off under separate landlords, but this system exists there already for some time, and the Norman barons follow without much difficulty the traces of their Saxon predecessors. The fee forms, or at least is intended to form, the appendage of a definite place, rather than the service contributions laid on the several tenants of the considerable district included in a barony.

Dorset may be taken as an example of the typical southern arrangement prevailing in most counties. The 5-hides groups and approximating combinations² forming the basis of knights' fees occur often. The larger townships composed of 10 hides and more are either subdivided into several fees as multiples of five,³ or, in the case of eccle-

² It must be borne in mind that the hides spoken of are mostly taken in the fiscal sense, and are therefore very uncertain as to their agrarian value. Therefore in many cases the Domesday estimates of plough-land and teams ought to be consulted in order to form an idea of the real value of the fees.

siastical manors, they fall into two portions, one being reserved for the use of the see or monastery and entered as frank almoigne, the other consisting of the military tenures 'defending' the entire fief in regard to military service, and cut out more or less on the 5 hide pattern.¹ In contrast with these appear the small groups supporting the light cavalry, the Mortain fees of two or three hides.² When these light horsemen are quartered on a 5 or 6 hide vill it is generally divided between two knights.³ In some cases, when the 5 hide standard seems to fail, we find that in the Domesday Survey land for five ploughs is mentioned, and the not unnatural inference is that the hidation was a beneficial one.⁴

Staffordshire presents an interesting variation of this system, in so far as its townships are small and fall more naturally into hamlets of two or three hides rather than into the larger combinations of five, ten hides, &c. The small Mortain fees are especially at home there, but as for the large ones, they are mostly formed by combinations of several villages.¹

Some of the counties of the Danelaw itself, like Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire, have already assumed more or less the same organization as those of the southern districts; while, on the contrary, counties included in the hidated region of England, but showing strong traces of Danish population and social institutions, like Cambridge-shire, are characterized by mixed and irregular formations.²

ties.

2. Speaking of the feudal military system, we must not forget that knight service was its chief but by no means its only expression. By the side of the knights' fees we find the tenures in sergeantry, which very often are an exact copy of the former, and differ from them only in the quality of the warrior who has to appear from them in the host. Upton, in Northamptonshire, had to send a sergeant to serve the king in his wars for forty days at his own cost; Sybercroft, in the same county, to find one man with bow and arrows, also for forty days at his own cost.³ In other cases the service of spearmen and men with axes is stipulated.⁴ Interesting entries refer to sergeancies by the service of acting as constables to foot soldiers—providing enfeoffed officers in the case of national levies.¹ The numerous tenures by castle-ward have also to be mentioned in this connexion.² But as has been said already, the sergeancies are by no means so uniformly cut to one pattern as the knights' fees. The term of service, as well as the customary obligations and the size of the estates, varies a great deal. In regard to the first, it is quite common to find short terms³ or rather vague conventions, in which the service is bound up with some particular kind of expedition, the defence of the Welsh Marches or of the sea border for example.⁴

It has to be noticed that no clear line can be drawn between military sergeancies and services which seem to us to be of a private character. Hunters and foresters are constantly mentioned as holding estates or smaller plots by the service of assisting the lord in his hunting expeditions, or watching over his forests, parks, and warrens.⁵ Riding sergeants, accompanying the lord or bearing his errands under certain conditions, are also of common occurrence, and must have formed an important part of the population of those days.⁶ Cooks, chamberlains, servants of different kinds, appear also enfeoffed of plots of land.¹ I lay stress on the fact because it discloses one of the roots of the feudal system—personal service, of which the military following is only one species.

As to the size of sergeancies, they range from great manors held by some grand sergeanty—as that of some officer²—to minute holdings of a fraction of the hide.³ The services required were so varied that there could be no fixed or even typical estimate for feoffments. It may be noted that there was a kind of standard for the squire's service in Normandy. It was deemed a kind of military tenure, a 'vavassorie', and estimated at half a knight's fee.⁴ But although similar attempts at estimation occur every now and then, they did not prevail or lead to the establishment of a rule.⁵

Drengage. One important variety of sergeanty is to be found in a tenure which often occurs in northern counties, namely in 'drengage'.⁶ It is distinguished from military service by its peculiar incidents.¹ We get its most detailed description in the Durham Boldon Book, where it appears as a kind of general service, including attendance on the lord in his hunting, overseer's duties in regard to less favoured classes of the population, military help in case of need without a distinct formulation of military service. The obligation of utware is sometimes mentioned among the duties of the Durham drengs, and under it have to be included all the 'foreign' duties of a tenant—payment of taxes to the king, as well as the acquitting of tenements from the burden of the king's expedition.² As in many similar cases, carriage duties, boon-works, and sometimes 'boon-erth' or 'gafolerth', were superadded to these 'squire's services' of the dreng, which do not, however, include week-work.³

The tenure goes back certainly to the times before the Conquest. It is mentioned once or twice in accounts of the proceedings which took place directly after the Norman invasion, as an institution characteristic of the old English arrangement, and gradually displaced by Norman military tenure. I need hardly recall to the mind of my readers the well-known account of the conversion of the drengs of the see of Canterbury into knights by Archbishop Lanfranc,⁴ or the altercation about the status of a dreng.⁵

Indeed, the origin of the class and of the term may be safely sought in the Danish expression dreng, corresponding to the Latin puer and possibly to the frequently occurring O.E. cild. All these names may well be applied to sergeants,

² Oxenhale: 'W . . . fecit utware quando positum fuerit in episcopatu' (Boldon Book, p. 583 a): the expression is more suited to taxation than to military service, but it must have included both. Cf. Growth of the Manor, 284, and Dr. Liebermann's Glossary to Anglo-Saxon Laws, v. 'utware.'

personal dependants, who sometimes received an outfit in the way of an estate.¹

The continuous existence of drengage in the north is an interesting feature, not only in itself, but also because it shows that there was no absolute break between the conditions preceding and those following the Conquest. Drengage is a Scandinavian institution bridging over the introduction of Norman rule, and not materially altered by the influence of French feudal law. There is a famous page of Domesday Book treating of that tenure in Lancashire just before the Conquest.² We hear of numerous freemen ('liberi homines') who held small estates termed manors, and concentrated around the great royal manors of Derby, Newton, Walintune, Blackburne, Lailand, and Salford. These freemen have to attend the shiremoot, the hundred-moot, and

Besides the generic expression 'liberi homines', these tenants are described in the case of Derby and Salford as thanes, in that of Walintune and Newton as drengs, in that of Lailand as homines, but there was very little difference in the condition of all these subdivisions of the class. They were all charged for the farm of the king, and most had to build houses for the king on his progresses, 'as if they were villains', to raise hedges and warrens, to send their men to help in the reaping the king's corn. The relief in case of succeeding to one's father was 40s., and it was intended to save the land and their chattels from confiscation. This characteristic condition shows that the possession both of the land and of the movables of these men was thought to be derived from the king's grant. This is further illustrated by the fact that these tenants had to pay 40s. if they wanted to 'recede' from the king's land. The drengs and thanes of Lancashire were emphatically the king's men. There is no peculiarly military trait about their tenure: they are merely free servants of the king endowed with lands. But we have to remember that the position of such a free servant, if endowed with land, in regard to the duty of serving in the host was a particular one. Although liable to be called up to the fyrð like any other person, his responsibility for not appearing was quite different; he was liable to lose his land, where a common freeman would simply incur a fine.¹ In a frontier district like Lancashire this meant a great deal, and although rents and agricultural services were required from the manors in time of peace, in case of a local expedition they had to provide soldiers. It is very important to know that the fees of the sergeants or ministers were still quite common in the north all through the feudal period. In the Domesday entries the arrangements appear almost entirely as a thing of the past, although of a very recent past¹; but later documents show thanage and drengage to be still flourishing in Lancashire, Cumberland, Westmoreland, Northumberland, and Durham. The fact that there is an appreciable difference between the thanes and drengs² of the district described in Domesday is a noteworthy one; the two designations differ in this case, at any rate, not in regard to substance but in their ethnographical origin; thanes are of English origin, drengs of Scandinavian, but in both cases we have to do with the armed sergeants of the king who held land endowments from him. The size of their holdings, or manors as they are termed, is not very large. In some cases it is equated with a hide, in others it is somewhat larger, in others again a good deal less;³ but we must remember that the hide in these parts was reckoned at 6 carucates of land. Still the tenants in question cannot be considered as anything but small squires, burdened with agricultural and personal services of a rather humble kind. They must have possessed horses, but their equipment could not have been very elaborate. When the time comes to instal knights they appear in much less numbers.

Thanes and sergeanties.

3. The case of the drengs makes one ask whether a good many of the so-called sergeanties of feudal times do not ascend to similar ministerial tenures of the age before the Conquest. There is a curious report in Bracton's Note Book of a litigation in regard to a fee dependent on the Abbess of Barking.⁴ The court had some trouble in classifying the tenure; it was not, strictly speaking, a military tenure, and yet it had certain features of such a one. It was said to be traceable in the customary incidents to about seventy years before the Conquest. The chief incident was the service of a riding attendant of the Abbess. Yet it was considered to be military in essence, and the corresponding incidents were held to follow from it.

² The expression dreng may possibly have been applied to people of a rather lower position than that sometimes held by free servants. In the details of the description of Derby thane alternates with radman, but the general position of the thanes of Derby and the drengs of Newton is practically identical.

This example is well fitted to impress on our mind the view that the staff of ministers and servants endowed with land was a social feature of the Anglo-Saxon as well as of the feudal epoch, and that the customary status of the latter has many of its roots in preconquestual conditions. If we turn to Domesday in our search of the sergeants we find a great variety of groups corresponding to this general designation. To begin with, there are some counties where a separate rubric is made for the estates eo quod predictus Henricus tenuit in soccagio predictam terram, et unde dicit quod predictus Henricus ita tenuit quondam terram suam de predicta Abbatisa in Dakeham, scilicet, quod reddidit ei per annum ad festum, etc., vi sol. et vi den. et solet itinerare cum eadem Abbatisa ad maneria sua in propria persona uel mittere cum ea quendam hominem Franciscum uel Anglicum, dum tamen non esset uillanus ipsius Abbatisse. . . . of the king's sergeants. Such is Wiltshire,¹ for instance, where these estates are carefully distinguished from those of thanes. On reading through the entries we find that the people mentioned as tenants are actual officers of the king's court, household, and military retinue—a porter, several chamberlains, an overseer of granaries, an arbalistarius. The men who held the lands T. R. E. are named thanes or known as such.² The estates described are mostly small, of 1, 1½, 2 hides, although, exceptionally, larger ones occur, for example, Thornwell, which paid geld for 7½ hides T. R. E. In Oxfordshire the lands of Richard Engaym and other officers (ministri) of the king also form a separate rubric.³ Here we find a treasurer (arcarius) and a goldsmith (aurifaber) mentioned expressly, and there can be no doubt that many of the tenants were officers of the civil or military household, while their Anglo-Saxon predecessors may have been either in the same position, or thanes, that is, as far as we can make out at present, personal followers of the king with no special duties assigned to them.

The close connexion between sergeancies and the office of thanes may be further illustrated by an entry from the Exon Domesday, where a porter (Will. Hostiarius) is said to hold thaneland in Devonshire.⁴ I need hardly say that similar household offices are often mentioned singly, without being ranged under a general rubric.⁵

4. By the side of household officers appears the numerous group entered in Domesday as radchenestri, or radmen. They are usually kept quite distinct from the rustics within the manor.¹ The size of these holdings is not large, one hide or two, with some few exceptions.² They carry on the agricultural work on their plots with the help of the members of their households and some labourers or slaves; the number of agricultural holdings dependent on them is very small when compared with the extent of their own husbandry.³ As agricultural tenants they are sometimes required to perform work on the estates of their lords,⁴ and yet they are emphatically described as freemen. At the same time they do not possess full power to dispose of their land, and are indissolubly attached to the manor unless they are separated from it by the lord himself.¹ Domesday does not dwell specially on the riding services, but there are indirect allusions to these², and the radmen frequently mentioned in the survey of Worcestershire³ are evidently of the same kind as the sergeants described in Wulfstan's well-known letter as subjected to the lex equitandi.⁴ These riding sergeants, frequently entered under the distinctive name of radknights, or radmen, in the western counties, were hardly confined to these, and may have also occurred in the east, where they were probably concealed under the more general designation of freemen or servientes.

It seems natural to explain the names of the group from the O. E. rád, and both the compound radknight, and the connexion with Oswald's lex equitandi, and the prevalence of the term in the western counties, make it most probable that we can rest content with the usual explanation of the terms in the sense of riding sergeants.⁵ Another explanation from the O.N. rádmadr, a steward, an overseer, literally a ruler, has been suggested,¹ but there does not seem to be much ground for a Scandinavian derivation in the particular district where they are mostly met with; and, besides, the suggested Scandinavian etymology would hardly fit the case of the 'radknights'.

An interesting question arises in regard to their military duties. Domesday does not mention them, as it generally omits to speak of the ordinary military obligations. It gives more information about their rents and agricultural services. Evidently the tenure was primarily meant to support officers, bailiffs, and messengers, who had to keep up the intercourse between the scattered parts of a great lord's possessions.

But it included personal attendance on horseback, and through the necessary keeping up of horses and of men armed for travelling in that unquiet period it presented the best formation for the discharge of the military duties incumbent on the lord's estate. There is no direct proof of specific military service imposed on the radmen, but it is characteristic that the subsequent sergeancies naturally fit into the place formerly occupied by radknights and similar servientes.² In laying stress on this connexion, we must not forget that the strict formulation of the military duties belongs in any case to the feudal period, and that the utmost that can be said about the preceding age is that a class of manorial officers had already formed itself, which was supported by land endowments and presented a convenient material for the discharge of the military obligations of great estates, in regard to the lord as well as to the king.³

On the estates of St. Peter of Gloucester we hear of a 'servitium esquieriae' in the same sense. Cart. of St. Peter (Rolls Series), ii. 208, 209.

Geneats.

The direct antecedent of the group of riding sergeants has to be sought, it seems, within the earlier Anglo-Saxon evidence in the class of so-called geneats, the fellows and followers of a landed proprietor. Its obligations are described at some length in one of the first sections of the Rectitudines Singularum Personarum.¹ The duties a geneat has to perform are very varied, and agricultural work is expressly mentioned among them, as well as the payment of rent in money and in kind, like that to which the radknights were subject. But the most characteristic service of the class is to ride errands and to drive loads.² The geneats were riding bailiffs and officers before all, and when we reflect on the agrarian constitution of those days we shall not wonder at the importance of this class. In this age of natural economy its emoluments were apt to take the shape of an assignation of land, and the geneat mostly became a tenant. On the other hand, his service was of especial value at a time when the intercourse between different places was so difficult to maintain, on account of bad roads, long distances, and dangers attending travelling.

Franci-
genae.

5. More directly connected with military callings were evidently the Frenchmen (Francigenae) frequently spoken of in Domesday.³ They occur mostly in cases when small tenants are mentioned,¹ not unnaturally, as the bigger French tenants are mostly entered by name. One might expect to hear of them more often, but it is to be remembered that only those are brought to our notice who have settled down as tenants,² while a large number must have remained attached to the households of the king and of great lords, and have got their maintenance from them.³ We find them described distinctly as 'servientes', and there is no doubt that they were used chiefly as a military retinue. keeping of such foreign domestic soldiers necessary. Besides the French, Flemings are mentioned. The well-known story of Eustache de Boulogne's adventures and mishaps in the reign of Edward the Confessor,¹ and other facts, show that the immigration of French soldiers, and their attempts to get a regular footing in England, began before the Conquest; and before this the French, Danes, and other Scandinavians must have played a similar part. Without attempting to follow the doings of these adventurers in detail, it is important for us to notice that these movements of immigration led, among other things, to the formation of small holdings, corresponding, not to the later knights' fees, but to sergeanties.²

Milites.

6. The most important questions in regard to the history of military settlements and of feudal service arise in connexion with the tenure of the knights, the military tenure par excellence. Was it introduced by the Conquest, or did it exist already before the Conquest in its main outlines? Was the equipment, the amount of service, and the size of the fees more or less prepared by Anglo-Saxon evolution? Or were they determined by the influence of French military institutions? Is the professional military class to be traced to Anglo-Saxon and Danish antecedents, or has it developed out of a conquering minority of French origin? These questions have been debated and solved in different ways, and we have to make up our mind in regard to their most likely solution.

The technical terms for a knight and a knight's fee in feudal documents are miles and feodum militis. The second of these does not actually occur in records of the Conqueror's time, but the history of the fees themselves has to be traced to it, in the light of the evidence about the ancient feoffments of William the Bastard. As for the first term, it is mentioned almost on every page of Domesday.¹ Let us take a couple of instances from Sussex. The Count of Ow held the manor of Hou, and out of the villains' land of this manor he had enfeoffed nine milites to the aggregate amount of $2\frac{1}{2}$ fiscal hides of 8 virgates to the hide. These $2\frac{1}{2}$ hides corresponded to $3\frac{1}{2}$ teams in demesne and 7 teams belonging to 12 villains and 3 bordarii. The lord's part was worth £14 and the land of the milites £7. 7s.² Of the nine milites one held half a hide, that is 4 virgates, one $4\frac{1}{2}$ virgates, one $2\frac{1}{2}$ virgates, and the other six 2 virgates each. Francwelle, in the same fee, presents a similar arrangement,³ with the difference that the whole manor had been given over to six milites. One of them, Norman, a Frenchman or a Scandinavian, had held alone T. R. E. It was rated at $1\frac{1}{2}$ hides, and contained land for two ploughs. Norman was still among the tenants, but he held only half a hide, while three of his comrades had 2 virgates each, and two 1 virgate each, making up the $1\frac{1}{2}$ hides, at the rate of 8 virgates per hide. All the six owned between them 1 plough and 8 villains, and 1 cottager with 4 ploughs. The value of the manor had increased from 40s. T. R. E. to 46s. at the time of the survey. The figures in these two cases are instructive; we see a considerable number of military tenants enfeoffed, with very small plots: if we start from the fiscal assessment, the fifteen tenements would give an average of $2\frac{1}{7}$ virgates per knight, while the number of virgates chiefly represented among the holdings would be two, or one quarter hide, according to the standard of 8 virgates to a hide. The figures as to ploughlands, teams, and income work out into even smaller quantities. There are only $4\frac{1}{2}$ ploughs in demesne, against 11 ploughs of the villains for the 15 tenements, and in the Frankwell case six military tenants have to share 2 ploughlands and 46s. income between them. One of the explanations for this strange state of affairs lies in the fact that most of these knights may have been enfeoffed in several townships, though it is difficult to make it out with exactness, as only personal names are usually given, and these such as constantly recur at that time. Still, the identity of some of the military vassals of the Count of Ow has been traced with great probability in some cases.¹ But it would be impossible to set our minds at rest with this observation. Although in some instances the small holdings of the milites present scattered possessions of rather important sub-tenants of the great feudatory lord,² in many other cases we can hardly escape from the conclusion that actual residence in a place was meant when the tenements are described, and that some at least of the milites mentioned in Domesday must have been endowed with very small holdings. This is especially apparent in cases when the milites in question are entered as tenants belonging to a manor, without being honoured with a specific reference to their names,³ but there can hardly be a doubt that the same must have been the case

² This is very clear, e.g. in the case of the Peterborough knights e.g. Lib. Nig. Mon. S. Petri de Burgo (Camden Soc.), pp. 168, 169: 'Descriptio militum de Abbacia de Burgo. Asketillus de Sancto Medardo tenet de Abbacia de Burch, in Hamtonascira x hidas, et iii partes i virgae. Et in Lincolnescira iii carrucas, et inde servit se vi milite. Et de feudo huius militis dedit Rex Willelmus senior Eudoni Dapifero in Estona i hidam et dimidiam, et mandavit de Normannia in Angliam Episcopo Constantiarum et R(otberto) de Oilli per breves suos ut inde darent ei excambium ad valens in quocumque uellet de iii uicinis comitatibus; sed Abbas noluit . . . with some of the named knights. Thus we are forced to admit that at the time of the survey the group designated as milites consisted of very mixed elements, and that by the side of important people, possessed of substantial holdings,¹ it contained a great number of minor adventurers who were glad to get some plot to support them.² These, certainly, did not represent the honour of five hides known to Anglo-Saxon custom, or the great or small knight's fee of later feudalism. Indeed, when the service of a knight (miles) is spoken of in Domesday it generally appears as a kind of addition to money rents, and corresponds to rather insignificant sums³.

There are several circumstances which go far to explain this phenomenon. To begin with, in many cases the knights in question were still in the stage of the personal following of a great man, living in his household and receiving outfit and presents from him. Even knights of great prowess and standing might in such cases be crowded on one or the other estate, and act, e.g., as the temporary garrison of a castle.⁴ It does not require a great effort of imagination to suppose that some of the milites who appear as small tenants in Domesday drew part of their maintenance and salary from their lord's domain,¹ and that their plots afforded them only a supplementary source of income.

Another observation which suggests itself to any diligent student of the Great Survey is that the milites in question are intermingled in such a way with Francigenae and servientes that they evidently include a great number of people who would have been called vavassors in Normandy and sergeants in the later nomenclature of English feudalism.² The definite references of the record substantiate what would otherwise be, necessarily, a guess. It is clear that the very numerous entries about the milites of the Conqueror's time cannot apply, and were not meant to apply, only to fully-equipped horsemen capable of performing knight's service for forty days. Where would the archers, the spearmen, and hatchetmen belong? Of the first two kinds the invading army had many, and as for the last they are sufficiently represented in the feudal lists of sergeants and in the Ordinances of Arms. Thus we come to the conclusion that the class of the milites, as well as that of the francigenae not further specified by name, must have consisted, to a large extent, of armed sergeants by the side of knights and riding squires.

This conclusion is fully borne out by another group of observations, namely by the evidence as to the connexion between the military class of the Conquest and Saxon antecedents. Although crowds of French adventurers had availed themselves of the grand occasion of bettering their circumstances by the conquest of England, yet even the military element of the kingdom was not exclusively represented by Frenchmen. The English soldiers (milites) are quite a standing feature of the survey,¹ and their numbers could be easily increased by a study of the personal names of the milites not specifically grouped as English. A great many Danes and Norsemen were of course included among these latter, although every now and then their distinct nationality would be recognized.²

7. Now the enrolment of English and Scandinavians among the military class of the Conquest is not merely a result of the admission of persons of English birth to the benefits and duties of a French institution. We find that the military class as it existed after the Conquest draws largely on the material and legal conditions which preceded the catastrophe, and that many of the institutional roots of Norman knight service have to be sought in the arrangements of Old English thanage.³

It may be said that the knights on the domain, exemplified by Odo of Bayeux's tenants in Folkestone or the garrison of Rochester, have their direct predecessors in the military household of Anglo-Saxon magnates—their huscarls or hired men.⁴ In the same way, the Norman knights are quartered in most cases on the same estates as were formerly held by thanes, and evidently occupy their very places.¹ Indeed, thanes are sometimes carried over, as it were, from T.R.E. to T.R.W.² and occupy at both periods a position corresponding to that of the milites. Sometimes the only difference seems to have been that the former were of English or Scandinavian, the latter of French, extraction.³ In East Anglia chiefly, but sometimes in other districts too, in the north and in the west, the milites of the Conquest take the place of preconquestual liberi homines, but the latter designation turns out to be nearly equivalent to the Old English thane, and was probably chiefly used for free warriors of Scandinavian origin.⁴

Two characteristic traits show to what extent the position of the thanes and of the milites after the Conquest was similar. The first often occupy portions of estates specially carved out for their use—this is the so-called thaneland, which cannot be separated from the rest of the estate or taken out of the over-lordship of the magnate to whom the main portion of the estate belongs. These very thanelands are found as the appanages of the milites or homines and opposed to the demesne portions of the lords after the Conquest.¹ At the same time there are practices in the period before the Conquest which closely correspond to the personal allegiance of later knights as sanctioned by homage: thanes 'go to hand' in regard to their lord: they have to renounce former allegiance if they want to accept a new one. Indeed, the famous Salisbury oath of all tenants of land (landsittende men) seems in one sense a variation of the 'going to hand' in use before the Conquest.²

In a word, the position of the feudal knight holding a fee under the personal tie of vassalage and the obligation of military service appears anticipated in every way by the status of the Saxon thane or liber homo holding land under a lord. The main differences consist in the fact that the part played by the Saxon free tenant corresponds both to that of the knight and to that of the sergeant of the Norman period, as the thanes, radmen, and liberi homines are not clearly divided from each other in point of quality of service and tenure. Secondly, the service of the Saxon free tenants is of a more general kind, and is not specifically military as in the case of the feudal vassals. It must be remembered that the king's thanes, of whom we know most, were originally household servants, dish thanes and stallers, as well as military followers. The apportionment of military service to rigid forms in respect of equipment, occasion, and time is also a result of French feudalism. But the military side of thane service, although not directly prominent in the general conditions of tenure, finds sufficient and drastic expression in other facts—in the laws of heriot, strictly regulated by Canute,¹ but slowly developed by long customary practice,² and manifestly derived from the conception of military outfit and service. Military service also is put down as the fundamental obligation of the thane in the description of his standing provided by the Rectitudines Singularum Personarum.³ This last notice is particularly interesting, inasmuch as it supposes that the tenorial quasi-feudal service is only a particular form, and the most typical form, of the trinoda necessitas. This information appears to provide us with a valuable connecting link in regard to the evolution of the tenure and of its feudal incidents. Originally, the trinoda necessitas had nothing to do with a special military tenure, and a thane's position had nothing to do with special military service. The trinoda necessitas was an obligation falling on all free-men, or, at least, on all free householders; thane service was a minister's, a servant's service in general. But when and in so far as the soil was parcelled out among a few great men holding enormous tracts or numbers of smaller estates, the duty came to concern the lords of these tracts and estates and to be performed primarily by their servants. The rule of the five-hide honour became in this connexion a rule as to the acquitting of districts or estates in proportion to multiples of five hides. The practical outcome of this was not necessarily and always a subdivision of the territory into five-hide units with a fully equipped horseman at the head of each; it was also the 'defence', the utware, of territory according to the five-hide or similar rule, with full possibilities of the great lord's 'sweating' of his followers by quartering them on smaller estates and keeping the rest of the acquitted territory for his own use. How far such operations were counterbalanced by the necessity of helping knights and sergeants with equipment and capital from above cannot be made out in detail, but the necessity for such supplementary arrangements may be taken for granted if we take the five-hide rule and corresponding calculations as to small fees and sergeancies to be something more than mere haphazard combinations.

Some curious cases supporting our contention as to the direct institutional connexion between thanage and military service appear in the history of great ecclesiastical lordships. The peculiarity of this case is that the churches and monasteries were not as a rule subjected to the violent dispossession which took place in respect of lay lordships. In most cases there was a continuity in the tenure and in the social life of the great ecclesiastical estates which cannot be matched in the history of lay fiefs. Instead of having to look out for Saxon predecessors and to speculate about the extent of violent change, we may restrict our inquiry to a conveniently narrow margin of transformation. And, from our present point of view, the question we have to ask is—had the great sees of Worcester, of Sherborne, of Lincoln, the monasteries of Peterborough, Shaftesbury, or Glastonbury, to change their military arrangements materially in consequence of the knights.

Conquest? Or did they substitute knights and sergeants for thanes and radmen more or less on the same conditions, although the service exacted came to be regarded as an obligation of feudal contract rather than of tenurial custom in acquitting the above-mentioned lordships in respect of the fyrð?

As to Worcester¹ we might appeal to a document of dubious authenticity, but evidently compiled very soon after the Conquest. The possession of the triple hundred of Oswaldeslaw is made the subject of a stipulation on the part of the king grantor, that the see of Worcester should hold it as long as it acquitted the service of the naval fyrð by providing for one scyppfylled of armed oarsmen—one man for five hides. An Abingdon Charter² of 821 had made the military service of twelve vassals the condition of holding.

There is an even earlier and undoubtedly genuine example in the endorsement of a deed made about 800 A.D. which regulates the service of a territory in Middlesex: it should be five men for thirty hides.³ It would be difficult to treat all these instances as Norman falsifications, and even if in one or other the hand of an interpolator may be discovered, it would seem rather strange that he should be so careful and so artful as to invent such very antiquarian conditions as the outfit of a scyppfylled. It looks as if the interpolator were at any rate guided by local traditions of a perfectly genuine kind.¹

In several cases entered in due form in the Domesday Survey the passage from Anglo-Saxon thane tenure to Norman military tenure may be illustrated from different points of view.

The surveys of the possessions of the Abbey of Peter-<sup>Peterborough</sup> borough in Northamptonshire, Lincolnshire, Leicestershire, ^{knights.} and Huntingdonshire,² when compared with the Survey of 1124 and with notices in the Chronicle of Hugh Candidus (about 1177), show a systematic separation between the land of the Abbey and that of its military tenants. In some cases whole estates are made over to these latter, in others they are quartered on parts cut out from larger estates, the minor portions of which remained with the monastery. The families of the tenants in question were of French origin, but the apportionment of the thaneland must have gone back to the time before the Conquest, as there are no traces of a difference in the tenure of the estates T. R. E. and T. R. W., although their rental was greatly increased in the interval.³ In several instances we gather from the Survey of 1124 and from notices of Henry II's time that part of the military service was still acquitted by the socmen on the estates.⁴ This is an important feature, showing that the ancient system of fyrð service imposed on free tenants of common and not specially military tenure was still going on in parts of the country, more especially in the Danish districts.¹ I have already called attention to the scattering of the plots attributed to single milites on the land of the Abbey, and to the traces of help from the Abbot in the case of some of them who would not otherwise have been able to perform their service. An interesting, and at first sight a puzzling, observation may be made in regard to the standard which regulated the apportionment of the fees. Roughly, the service of one knight was reckoned for two or three hides. The carucates in Lincolnshire were mostly treated on the same standard, with the exception of one instance where nine carucates are equated to three hides.² The systematic carrying out of this principle of apportionment, and the formation of sergeants' tenements for those who did not reach the minimum of two hides,³ points to a policy which probably sprang from the nature of the service itself. The most plausible explanation seems to be suggested by the great reduction of the Northamptonshire hidage, the result of which must have been to let down honours of five hides to three⁴ and two hides, so that the Old English apportionment must have been in correspondence with the normal rate noticed before.

The manors of the Archbishop of Canterbury in Kent, the Bishop of Sherborne in Dorset, and of the Bishop of Lincoln in Oxfordshire show very clearly the subdivision of ecclesiastical property into the home part reserved for the maintenance of Bishops, chapters, or monks, and the thaneland to which the defence of the sees as to fyrð was confided.¹

On the other hand, such lists as those concerning the repartition of estates between church, milites, and thanes in Somerset² substantiate the view that the main difference between military tenants and thanes lay in their nationality, an inference further confirmed by the names of thanes and of milites as far as they are preserved in the Exon. Domesday.³ The opposition between Franci milites and Thani anglici is laid down by this record in as many words,⁴ but these very people who are termed Franci milites in Devonshire are named Franci thegni in Somerset.⁵ On the other hand, the estates of the thanes disappear later on among the fees and fractions of fees of ordinary knights and sergeants.⁶ In other words, the two institutions were so similar that the passage from the one to the other was effected without any noticeable break.

The study of military institutions in the eleventh century Summary. suggests, as it seems to me, several not unimportant conclusions as to the course and causes of social evolution.

Natural husbandry provides the broad ground on the basis of which all the institutions of the time were constructed. The local forces of society aimed at direct consumption of produce on the spot. Commercial intercourse and money dealings played an entirely subordinate part. Therefore the attempts to organize public force on commercial lines by hiring mercenaries were either casual expedients or followed on exceptional pressure on the part of conquerors. They could not lead to the formation of a permanent system.

⁶ E.g. Sherborne, Dd. i. 77 a (milites and taini), cf. Feudal Aids, ii. p. 4, Hundredum de Shirburn (de feodis militum).

The second effect of natural husbandry on military organization was the introduction of land tenure as the main condition of military service. The influence of this element makes itself felt in Anglo-Saxon and Anglo-Danish as well as in Anglo-Norman society. Warriors had to be settled and to receive means of existence and emoluments in the shape of tenements of some kind. The obligation may be expressed or understood, formulated strictly or implied in a loose way, but it appeared in all three cases and facilitated the passage from each one of the three systems to the other. The thaneland, the holding of the Anglo-Danish liber homo, and the fief of the Norman knight stood on the same line.

Natural husbandry in its agricultural stage leads to an aristocratic military system because it involves the separation of the class permanently engaged in agricultural work from the class permanently engaged in warlike pursuits. The professional soldier naturally becomes the lord of the professional labourer. The development of the professional warrior was bound up with a special and rather costly outfit, a good deal of leisure devoted to warlike occupations, and a revenue representing the results not of productive labour but of a political superiority. The differentiation between warriors and labourers was not brought about in a day. It was the result of a long process in the course of which the numerous hosts of small freemen, grouped on tribal lines or on the principle of guild association under a few leaders, were gradually subdivided into a body of occasional militiamen and a class of thanes or military tenants. The chief features of this process may be summarized under the following heads:—

1. The service of the free tribesman, of the one-hide householder, and of the representative of a five-hide honour mark the principal stages of this evolution.

2. The Danish here corresponds in a general way to the early Anglo-Saxon fyrð.

3. The array of the fyrð for home defence included all fyrð-worthy men, the array for the king's expedition a picked force collected on a tenurial standard. The scypp-fylled appears as a variety of the latter.

4. The standards of equipment and service in the Anglo-Norman army were fixed by the great knight's fee, the small knight's fee, and various sergeancies. The great knight's fee was estimated on the average in the twelfth century at fifteen or sixteen marks' income, and the small knight's fee at two-thirds of the great one. The notion of the honour of five hides, derived from the Saxon customs as to the king's expedition, asserts itself sometimes in the apportionment of the fees in the Norman period in the south of England.

5. The military tenants of the Conquest included knights and sergeants. They step naturally into the places occupied formerly by thanes, drengs, radknights, and liberi homines.

6. The law and apportionment of knights' fees is the product not only of French examples and irregular bargains between the Conqueror and his followers; they have been largely influenced by the rules as to the selection of picked men for the Old English king's expeditions on the one hand, by the customs as to thanage on the other.

7. The difference between thanage and Norman military tenure lay mainly in the looser character of the first as based on a general contract of service. Yet the military side of this contract becomes very prominent in the eleventh century.

SECTION II: JURISDICTION

CHAPTER I

custom.

1. I DO not want to speak of the well-known features of English provincial organization: the subject has been treated in such an exhaustive manner by Stubbs, Gneist, Maitland, and others, that it would be needless to revert to it. One side in the life of provincial and local institutions cannot, however, be passed over without some discussion in a book treating of social history—namely, their relation to the groups and ranks of society, their influence on the formation of such groups and ranks. In regard to the counties Domesday presents some curious indications. One of its most important features is the series of customals serving as an introduction¹ to the survey of several counties. They do not treat merely of the revenues of the Crown, but also of all sorts of matters indirectly connected with them—of Crown suits, franchises, military levies and guard duties, private war, &c.² The returns enrolled in Domesday are evidently the result of presentments made by inquests consisting of all the jurors of a county, although we do not know in exactly what way the machinery of the Survey was modified to serve this particular need. Whether, for example, the County Courts took any part in formulating them; and whether the verdicts are to be considered, in this case, as the pronouncement of the thanes of the shires only, or also of the rustics and the vilis plebs, which were not left aside in the compilation of the local reports.³ The circles of local usage would be narrower: the customs of a town, like Colchester or Bury St. Edmunds, might be occasionally revealed to us, at least in part, and tracts with a very peculiar physiognomy, like the borderlands of Wales, or the district between the Ribble and the Mersey, would also receive a special description. We need not recall to the memory of our readers that later on every town and manor might have a body of local custom to appeal to. But on the whole it is according to counties that legal customs are formulated in Domesday, and it is evident that this is not a casual arrangement which might easily have been superseded by a different one. It has its roots in the conformation of legal institutions in the country, and may serve as an indication of processes with which we have to reckon very materially. The fact is, that before the Common Law of England was worked out in the Royal Courts of the feudal age the main body of English law flowed in the channels of provincial customs, and the shire-moots were the chief institutions concerned with the definite laying down of it. There was a certain stock of law declared and enacted by the kings, but it covered only the least portion of the whole ground. Indeed, a good deal of the contents, even of the laws promulgated by the kings, was provincial in origin, and most of the litigation of the country and of its voluntary jurisdiction was shaped by the pronouncements and decisions of the County Courts.¹ This main principle is but slightly modified by the fact that sometimes several counties joined, in order to declare the law, and to lay down a decision in some particularly important trial;² and that, on the other hand, some counties, like Yorkshire, consisted, in truth, of several districts, which might be considered, in certain respects, as independent provinces. There is certainly a movement of transformation in the history of English counties, as in everything else, and it is interesting to note some traces of their rise and growth;¹ but these are matters for the antiquarians: the principle of county autonomy is not disturbed by them, at least for the period of the Conquest and the two or three centuries immediately preceding it.

Legal peculiarities of shires.

A direct consequence of this may be seen in the fact that the lines of cleavage between the different legal and social varieties of English life follow to a great extent county boundaries. Apart from such fundamental distinctions as that of the Danelaw as against Saxon England, we find several instances of sharp contrast between adjoining shires. The most remarkable is afforded by Kent; not only is the system of agrarian measures quite peculiar there, and certainly goes back to the beginnings of the Kentish kingdom² (sulungs and yokes against hides and yardlands), but not long after the Conquest we find a whole body of customary rules in force in the county which are directly opposed to those prevailing in the rest of England. Socially, the most important of these is the famous rule of gafolcund (gavelkind), succession demanding equal division among sons,³ the hearth being reserved to the younger; and, needless to say, the enforcement of this rule produced a very different system of holdings from that

v hidas diratiocinauit Walterus abb. ad Ildebergam in iiii sciris coram episcopo baiocensi et aliis baronibus regis.' Cf. 238 c (Aluestone, Warwick). In cases concerning kings and very great men the Witan at general assemblies decided. E.g. Thorpe, Dipl. p. 201—the declaration of Queen Eadgifa as to litigation in regard to her estates. Cf. 207-9.

² We find the sulungs, yokes, and aratra, as opposed to hides and manentes or cassati, in some of the most ancient of the genuine charters that have come down to us. E.g. Earle, Land Charters, 17 (A. D. 700 or 715); Cod. Dipl. 195 (A. D. 811).

commonly prevailing in feudalized counties. The unity of the sulungs and yokes was kept up artificially, but they were in truth covered by a network of entangled rights, and the economic exploitation of the land tended to a parcelling of it up into small plots, instead of a concentration into efficient husbandry units. This Kentish system of succession is the corollary of a mobilization of land tenure and of great freedom in the choosing of pursuits on the part of labourers and small landowners.¹ With all its accompanying circumstances, it accounts, probably, for the startling fact recognized by the exponents of Common Law in the thirteenth century, namely, that there was no villainage in Kent in the later legal sense, that is, no servile population holding at the will of the lord. And what is more, a whole string of rules of private law, which are not immediately derived from social standing, are framed by this provincial custom²—rules in regard to freebench, to wardship, to freedom from forfeiture.³ These peculiarities of Kentish custom interest us here from the point of view of the shire autonomy they disclose. Nothing of the kind is recognized in Sussex, Surrey, or Essex, just over the border. Customs similar to gavel-kind may be noticed in this or the other place outside Kent,¹ but they would be rooted in manorial usage and not in county law, whereas the rules enumerated in the Kentish custumal may be considered, if one may use the expression, as the Common Law of the shire. Clearly the jurisdiction of the shire-moot² played a decisive part in shaping the local usages of this region into determined legal principles, just as later on the jurisdiction of the King's Courts unified the Common Law of England.

³ Bracton's Note Book, pl. 1338: 'Isabella de Grauenel v. Thomam de Wadenhale medietatem c. acr. et septem acr. terre cum pertinenciis in Nywelande etc. ut dotem suam etc. et v. Et super hoc uenerunt milites de eodem comitatu et petunt libertatem et consuetudinem comitatus sibi teneri.'

Another instance of sharp cleavage between adjoining counties is presented by the comparison of the surveys of Suffolk and Norfolk on the one hand, Essex, Hertfordshire, Cambridgeshire, and Lincolnshire on the other. The two East Anglian shires are not only described in a different way from the Mercian and Saxon provinces bordering on them, but they display, also, peculiarities in their political and social structure. The system of distributing the 'Scot' among manors is peculiar: the very minute settlement of the position of freemen and socmen, when compared with the neighbouring counties, being due, not only to the matter-of-fact conditions, but also to the peculiar treatment of questions of status by East Anglian County Courts.³ It is not likely that this difference in arrangement should be traceable chiefly to the separate existence of East Anglia as a kingdom or an earldom. Some of the traits just mentioned belong to a period when the two shires had ceased to form a united body separate from the rest, and although the policy of East Anglian earls may have had something to do with the division of the land, it hardly extended to the settlement of all these intricate questions of commendation, soke, and land tenure which are constantly noticed by the Survey. These questions must have demanded the constant attention of the thanes of the Norfolk and Suffolk shire-moots before they came to the cognizance of the jurors of William the Bastard's Inquest.

² After all, these special customs of honours and manors are also traceable to the action of separate courts.

The customs as to fyrd attendance are another point on which the lines of cleavage between counties became very noticeable. Why should the jurors of Berkshire make such a definite statement about the rules of military service in their county? ¹ Why are the duties of the Welsh contingent mentioned expressly in the custumal of Herefordshire? ² Because, evidently, the ordinary precepts about the trinoda necessitas were insufficient to settle the particulars in such cases. Nor is it at all likely that in other counties, although no explicit enrolment with regard to such rules is made, there should not have been similar peculiarities in regard to fyrd attendance, frontier expeditions, &c. Supplementary arrangements could not be dispensed with, because the general principle of the fyrd obligation was too broad to ensure a settlement of the many questions arising in practice. How far these supplementary arrangements had to be framed by provincial customs in every instance we cannot tell, but we know enough to maintain that the shire-moot of each county had an extensive and decisive jurisdiction in such questions. The Witan of the realm put forth general requirements, and the royal officials had to watch over the efficiency and completeness of the national force, but the details as to repartition and enforcement of service were left to the shires themselves.

From these demonstrable facts we may surmise that, in the formation of group distinctions, the customary lore of the thanes of the shire played a great part. It would be wrong to assume that it was the only, or even the chief, agent in the matter. Royal authority, the pressure of economic wants, the strong hand of the mighty, the distribution of capital, have certainly to be reckoned with in no slight degree. But before making up our mind as to the relative influence of these several factors, we must lay stress on each one of them in turn as they present themselves. And there can hardly be a doubt that in regard to the preliminary processes preceding the wholesale arrangement of feudalism by the Conquest, the jurisdiction of the Old English County Courts exerted a most powerful influence; this influence did not altogether cease even after the Conquest, when the new French administration had constantly to appeal to the traditions of the former period, and the provincial institutions remained active in their sphere, although their competence became more restricted.

2. The origins of the hundred as a subdivision of the shire need not concern us here. Whether it was a comparatively modern machinery introduced by Edgar, or the result of a gradual development of local government, or an English variety of a universal Teutonic institution, it was in full action long before Domesday, even its Danish counterpart,¹ the wapentake, being more than a century old at that time. Nor is it necessary to investigate the various district divisions intermediate between the county and the hundred—the Riding, treading, rape, last¹—nor the local branches which are sometimes mentioned within the hundred, the leets, wards,² &c. All such investigations may be left on one side as not affecting the main issue. The subject which immediately interests us is the part played by the hundred, in the judicial organization of the county on the one hand, in its financial system on the other. For the bulk of the population it was the most common and active of the public institutions they had to deal with. The small landowners and tenants had not often to do with the shire-moot; already in the eleventh century the latter was managed by a group of thanes, which might be likened to the county families of later days, well-to-do people who could afford to appear at the sessions, and were able to exercise local influence. Thus, although the small freeman suitors were not excluded from the county, they played hardly any part in its affairs; they had not sufficient power and energy to keep up their real participation in its administrative and judicial business. It was different, to a certain extent, with the hundred. Its court met sufficiently often to transact a good deal of legal and administrative business, the attendance of small suitors was exacted with some severity, and the place where the hundred court was held was within easier reach for every one.³ The history of

Cf. Testa de Nevill, 319 b (Wapent. de Avelund, Hund de Brune, &c., Lincs.). The fact that leets appear as fractions of hundreds is important as an explanation of the Court leet, which is, at bottom, a portion of the Hundred Court in private hands.

³ See the transactions witnessed and confirmed by the hundreds in Northamptonshire in regard to property ceded to Peterborough Abbey (Cart. Sax. 1130). In one particularly important instance the whole here of Northamptonshire appears to ratify the transaction—a shire-moot is evidently meant. E. g. Cart. Sax. 1130 (Medehamstede, 972-992): 'Dis sind þa festermen þe Osferð and þûr funden Adeluolde b and Ælfrice cýlde and Ealdulfe ab . on æhte hundred gemote æt wylmes forða for hiora magas æt þan lande æt Beringafelde . . . þa Elfric public jurisdiction in the local divisions is intimately connected with the fate of this court.

Now the hundred may be regarded from two points of view. It was the congregation of the freemen, or as we should say of the citizens of the district, of the men mot-worthy, fyrd-worthy, and fold-worthy;¹ and it was a territorial union of all the townships and estates of the district. In the composition of the hundred one may notice both elements; both the free owners as such, and the estates as such, were represented, the first individually, the second by delegations of the lord, the steward, or of committees of six villagers, including the priest and the reeve.² The attendance of the suitors was urgently demanded, and fines inflicted for non-attendance, and this has ensured the existence of sufficient evidence about the status of the suitors. According to the position of the shire one or the other element predominates, mostly the territorial, as far as we can see from the records of feudalized England.³ We find, even, that a special status of hundredors, of tenants bound to acquit a manor, or township, by suit to the hundred court, is created by custom.¹ Still, the personal aspect never disappears entirely, and on the great law days the whole free population is called up to stand before the sheriff, or the magnate holding the view of frank-pledge, even the lowest classes being represented by their tithings, or at least by their chief pledges, head-boroughs,² &c.

² Leg. Henr. I, c. VII, 7. Cf. VIII, 1; the Lib. Eliensis, Introduction, mentions an increased deputation of eight for the purpose of the Domesday Survey. Cf. the twelve men from towns, e. g. Chester, Dd. i. 262 d: 'Tunc erant xii iudices ciuitatis et hi erant de hominibus regis et episcopi et comitis. Horum si quis de hundredet remanebat die quo sedebat sine excusatione manifesta x solidos emendabat inter regem et comitem.'

Originally both aspects of the hundred seem to have been connected in such a way that the court ought to have been formed of all the free tenants of the hundred, each possessed normally of one hide, while the followers (folgarii) of the 'hearthfast' men were represented by the latter as their pledges. The fact that the personal responsibility was supported by a collective liability of the tithings did not alter the fundamental relation of the two classes—that of the freeholders and suitors of the hundred, and that of the dependent population. In this construction the freeman possessed of one hide appears as the typical landowner and member of the hundred. Traces of such freemen outside the manors attached to hundreds are still to be found in Domesday, or rather the freemen, who are generally distributed in the Survey according to manors, appear, exceptionally, as directly attached to the hundreds;³ and there can be hardly a doubt that

Hundred-hides.

The hundred-hides theory is clearly traceable in the composition of many hundreds in Domesday, or in documents of nearly the same time. Many hundreds were actually composed of the required number of hides,¹ and when they got to be too large or too small they were treated as, and called, double, triple hundreds, hundreds and a half, or half-hundreds.² In course of time the estates got to be anything but single-hide holdings; in the overwhelming majority of cases they contained five, ten hides, or, on the contrary, fractions of a hide. But the hundred was nevertheless rounded off as much as possible to contain the average of a hundred hides. How are we to explain such regularity in the midst of all the incidents of land tenure? How could the hundreds keep up their round numbers while the estates composing them grew and diminished, while so many of the original members of the hundreds ceased to be tenants-in-chief, and disappeared within the estates of greater and more successful men? It has to be said, to begin with, that the passage of some of

Hoc attestatur totus comitatus. the hundred tenants into a lower story of tenure, if one may term it so, did not itself affect the hidage of the district, inasmuch as the new lord represented the hide which had lapsed into his hands as well as those formerly held by him. It was different, of course, when the transfer of property led to a change in the distribution of the hides into hundreds: if, as not unfrequently happened, the manor to which the small and formerly independent plot came to belong was situated in another hundred, or even in another county. This certainly led to complications in tenure and fiscal liability, of which there are so many reported in Domesday.¹ But, after all, the fact that the normal hundreds were primarily composed of hides, and not of estates, made it possible to keep up the tradition of the original numbers very tenaciously. Secondly, there are some clear cases of rearrangement, when great changes in the distribution of the hides necessitated the formation of new hundreds, and the different grouping of old ones.² And, lastly, it has to be said that, although the regularity does make itself felt in many districts, there are a great many others which cannot be reduced to any regularity. One need only glance at the tables of hundreds belonging to the southern counties in order to realize the meaning of this observation.³ Very characteristic indications are given in this respect by two counties situated at the extreme ends of the island—Kent and Devon. The south-eastern county is full of exceedingly small hundreds, of which some contain only three or four townships; ⁴ the hundreds of Devon extend over wide tracts of land, of which a great part was hardly cultivated at the time of the Survey.¹ The sulungs of Kent do not stand in any regular relation to the hundreds, and as for the hides of Devon, they present artificial units of taxation not corresponding in the least to actual ploughlands. The number of Devonshire hides in the hundreds are therefore small, and hardly ever approach the hundred; and the same may be said of the sulungs of Kent. Yet the reasons for this superficial similarity lie in directly opposite deviations from the common standard of the hide. The Kentish households were crowded on to the territory of the sulungs, and the hundreds were evidently never meant to be enumerations of these latter, but, if anything, enumerations of households which, for all we know, may have been near enough to the mark, at least in old times when the Jutish immigrants were crowded on a narrow strip of territory. It is not without significance that the number of these hundreds roughly corresponds to half the number of the hides assigned to Kent in the so-called Tribal Hidage,² and which never reappear in later records.

On the contrary, Devonshire suffered from scarcity of population and want of capital. Its hidation was beneficial, that is, a few hide units were assigned, not only to large tracts, but even to estates containing a good many plough-teams. Therefore the territorial hundreds could not keep pace with the hidage. Although, as a matter of fact, they were much more extensive than in other places, still the number of hides in them did not nearly reach the average.³

Curious provincial variations have been noticed in the north, where we find hundreds of 12 carucates, and combinations of 6, 12, and 18 hundreds.⁴ The numbers are evidently grouped artificially according to northern duo-decimal schemes. It is not unlikely that, at the bottom of these strange computations, there may lie the toft, as one man's land, leading to the carucate, as tenmanland.¹ The hundred would then consist, not of households, or plural combinations, but of single men's holdings. The higher units would have to be formed by a piling up of dozens and half-dozens of these smaller hundreds, and it is clear that the artificial groups in question were formed anew by the northern conquerors of the Danelaw.

The hundred is not only a district with a jurisdictional centre, it is also a union for the purpose of exacting fiscal dues and public contributions of all kinds—police service, military service, attendance at inquests and judicial courts.² A township may be included in a hundred for payment of geld, and for the fyrð, although it is incorporated in a franchise in respect of jurisdiction.¹ A few cases of extra-hundredal plots are mentioned in the Survey, and it is added that they do not geld with the hundred, nor do they attend it, nor appertain to it,² meaning of course that the tenants do not go to the hundred-moot, and are not in scot and in lot with the members of the hundred in regard to the payment of geld.

² e.g. Dd. ii. 235 a: (Necton, Norfolk) 'Nechetuna tenet Radulfus (de toenio) . . Habet in longo i m. et dim. in lato et reddit in gelto ix d. quando hundredum scotat xx. sol.'

The hundred being considered as the normal institution providing local administration and justice, the suitors of the hundreds were, in a sense, the typical citizens. Indeed we hear, not unfrequently, of the suit to the hundred as being the condition of tenure for the ordinary freeman; he is a suitor to the hundred, a suitor or socman of the King in the hundred.³ According to a most curious Norfolk entry, an attempt was made in the case of Fersfield to distinguish between tenants of less than thirty acres, who were to look for justice to manors, and were to act as suitors to their courts, and those holding thirty acres and more, who remained suitors to the hundred.⁴ So clear a cleavage does not appear in other places, but the principle involved is probably underlying the condition of most of the freemen and King's socmen in East Anglia. In Norfolk and Suffolk the free elements of the population were clearly successful in upholding their direct relation to the Royal hundreds and their quality as free tenants. It did not follow that, even in the case of subjection to private jurisdiction, they ought to have lost this latter quality, but naturally enough this subjection was regarded as a step downwards, and the records are very careful to distinguish between the position of the King's tenants and that of suitors to hundreds in private hands.¹

The absorption of Crown rights by privileged subjects is one of the most important and characteristic features of feudalism, and in regard to the hundred jurisdiction it is expressed in the alienation of all sorts of dues connected with this jurisdiction, up to the surrender of the entire administrative and judicial leadership of the hundred. It is sufficient to point to a few instances of the grant of the right to levy the fines and wites accruing to the lord of the hundred.² In the hundreds still public two-thirds of these judicial dues went to the Crown, while one-third was reserved for the earl (or the sheriff) of the shire. Both these items are often alienated to private lords, and sometimes they are commuted into a lump payment, liberating the hundred from the duty of accounting for each single fine and wite levied by it.

By the side of these partial grants of fiscal regalities stand complete surrenders of jurisdiction, and even of all administrative rights attached to the hundred.¹ A charter of William the Conqueror to Worcester gives a rather full enumeration of these,² while another charter of Edward to St. Peter of Chertsey³ is interesting, inasmuch as it contains, besides the surrender of jurisdiction, a characteristic reference to the surrender of all work and wara to the church services in kind, probably riding and carrying services, as well as week-work, along with rents, wara being taken in this case as the home taxation of the manor, the inwara rather than the utwara. A note about the customs of Taunton mentions that the tenant of every one of the so-called nine hides has to pay church-scot and tithe (eight pennies per hide), and is to seek justice and pay fines and wites in regard to homesocn and forestal, breach of peace and capture of thieves, compurgation and ordeals, and fyrd-wite, at the Manor of Taunton, to which the Crown rights of the hundred of Taunton had passed. Besides, every one of the tenants had to do suit at the manorial hundred court as often as he was summoned.⁴ The tenants of some other places were subjected to the same court, in regard to the above-mentioned Crown pleas, but had to attend the moots only three times a year.¹ Yet even in such cases attendance after extraordinary summons was sometimes specially claimed.² In a charter to Abingdon the soke of the hundred of Hornemere is ceded by King Edward the Confessor to the Monastery, with the understanding that neither sheriff nor mótgerefa (the hundred-caldor, hundred man) might henceforth claim any suit, nor call any moot, within this hundred, unless by leave of the Abbot.³

FRANCHISES

franchises.

I. THE passage of entire hundreds, and of jurisdictional and fiscal regalities connected with hundreds and shires, into private hands, leads us directly to the question as to the forms and origin of feudal rights of jurisdiction. All the well-known franchises or liberties of the feudal age were chips from the block of Royal authority. They were severed from it at a time when it was found impossible to govern society by the direct command of the King or of his officers, and to render justice by the direct intervention of the King and of his judges. The local decentralization of feudal rule called for a dismemberment of public authority; it had to be confided to locally influential people; but the idea that all such delegations of power proceeded ultimately from the king's grant was never abandoned, and helped the Crown to resume its alienated functions when it was again strong enough to do so. The Placita de Quo Warranto give the best information about the struggle and compromises between the Crown and its vassals, in regard to franchise, after the restoration of Royal power under Edward I, and it would be an interesting undertaking to go through this immense store of materials in order to gather the threads of the principal English franchises. It is not my purpose to attempt such a task, but I should like to point to a few instances taken from the judicial records of the thirteenth century, in order to show how intimately the later franchises were connected with the private appropriation of rights, vested in hundreds and shires, which we have just been discussing. If we look at the great collection of pleas made by Bracton while preparing his treatise, we find, among other things, a very suggestive selection of cases treating of franchise privileges. There is, for instance, a case turning on the right of the Liberty of Berkhamstead to try suits which ought to have gone to the county in its own court.¹ There is a significant litigation as to the right of the Abbey of Beaulieu to exact services, from certain free tenants, for the afforciamentum, the strengthening, of their court of the Manor of Farringdon in Berkshire,² evidently in connexion with the regalities alienated to that court. There is a verdict on the famous liberties belonging to Bury St. Edmunds in Suffolk.³ In a dispute between the Bishop of Ely and the Abbot of Ramsey the origin of the disputed rights is clearly traced to grants of sake and soke, thus following feudal contentions to their old English beginnings.⁴

authority.

Domesday Book supplies us with a great number of indications about the gradual breaking up of Royal power in criminal jurisdiction, and the attempts of the Crown to keep at least a fraction of it. The process is universal, but its results are very different according to localities, being brought about, in each single instance, by matter-of-fact relations. Let us take, as an instance, the position of affairs in Chester. The king and the earl are strong enough to keep the great Crown cases in their hands, and they divide the profits of jurisdiction between themselves, two-thirds being reserved to the king, one-third to the earl. Besides the ordinary Crown cases, two special crimes are mentioned, the jurisdiction over which, with the profits accruing from it, are reserved for the king and earl. Their reeve in Chester is to receive the fines for false coinage, and for the brewing of bad beer, in whose land soever these crimes may have been committed.¹ The case is interesting on account of the wide extension of the rights of public authority, as represented by king and earl; we are on the soil of a Palatinate, which later on was distinguished by the extraordinary franchises of its holder, the Palatine of Chester.² Other forfeiture fines were in use all along the border of Wales, in Herefordshire, and Shropshire. Most conspicuous is the right to claim one-third of the booty in case of private feud among the Welsh.³ It is remarkable that the fyrdwite for neglect of military service appears in the shape of two widely different sums, forty shillings and one hundred shillings. The first occurs especially in cases of failure to appear in Welsh expeditions, the second in all probability applies to neglect of general summons to serve. It appears in the same way in Oxfordshire, which had nothing to do with the Welsh wars.¹ The great fyrdwite is emphatically termed forfeiture, forisfactura, perhaps because thanes holding land were liable to forfeiture in such cases. The hundred shillings fine would have thus to be considered mainly as a redemption from the forfeiture of land.

An important group is formed by cases in which the king grants away jurisdiction and profits in regard to all minor pleas except six. These are hamsoen, the breaking into a house; grithbreche (breach of the king's peace); forestal (attack on the highway); murder; reception of an outlaw; leyrewite (adultery). The reservation of six forfeitures is rather common, but there are some variations in the making up of the list. In Kent, for instance, homicidium, murder, is not included at all, while theft appears as one of the delicts leading to forfeiture—namely, if a thief has been sentenced to death, half his chattels go to the king. In cases of adultery the man was adjudged as a 'wite-theow' to the king, the woman to the archbishop, except on the lands of St. Augustine, Canterbury, and of St. Martin. These great ecclesiastical foundations excluded the king, and had therefore the right to punish the offending adulterer themselves.² The Kentish enumeration, if murder and fyrdwite should be added, would be exceptionally complete, and would contain actually, not six, but eight reserved cases. Otherwise we generally hear of six only. In some Norfolk cases it is interesting to note the contrast between the six cases and the right of sake and soke ceded to manorial lords; one might almost compare the distinction with that, common on the Continent, between haute justice and moyenne et basse justice. A material difference would, however, exist in the fact that the haute justice was determined by the eventual penalty; it was, to use the German expression, a 'Blutbann'.¹ Some similar idea was contained in germ in the English distinction, as is shown by the Kentish mention of capital punishment for theft.² In a few exceptional instances even the six forfeitures are surrendered to private lords. A conspicuous case of the kind is presented by Bury St. Edmunds.³

It is not unusual to find that four forfeitures⁴ are reserved to the king instead of six; as, for instance, in Worcestershire, or in Berkshire, where a baron gets his land exempted from all customary payments except fines for theft, murder (and manslaughter), homfare, and breach of the king's peace.⁵

Even more frequent is the reservation of three Crown cases. In the Shropshire custumal it is even stated that three forfeitures—for breach of peace, for breaking into a house, and for forsteal, were reserved to the king's domain all through England.¹ This is not literally true, as we have already been able to gather from previous instances. Nor can there be a doubt that the list of the three reserved Crown cases was formed in different ways in various places.² Such a treatment is in keeping with the customary character of all these franchises. The warrant of express grant is sometimes mentioned³ and exacted by the Crown; such a grant would be invaluable in case of a dispute. But there can be no doubt that it would have been impossible for all those who claimed franchises to produce grants or to appeal to the testimony of a county court, or a hundred-moot, when such a grant should have actually been produced. Custom, usage from time immemorial, came to be a test in many if not most cases, and we see that such a test is actually appealed to, though not always with success, in the Quo Warranto inquests.

Another explanation of the variety in question may be that in some cases it was not meant to affirm that only three forfeitures went to the king, and that, e. g., forsteal or breach of peace was not reputed a Crown forfeiture, although the three excepted cases ceded to the burgesses of the new castle of Rhuddlan⁴ were said to comprise only manslaughter, theft, and homfare. This may, after all, be an inexact form of expression, and mean in this as in some other cases⁵ that three out of the six great Crown forfeitures had passed into the hands of these privileged tenants.

However this may be, an interesting feature of some of these instances is the fact that the right to exact fines for minor offences, and to be exempted from paying these fines to the king or the officers of one of his courts, is expressly conceded to bodies of men who club, or 'scot,' together to commute the casual payments into a lump sum, and are thereby liberated from a part of the ordinary jurisdiction. The most famous instance of this kind is presented by the socmen of the Huntingdonshire manor of Broughton, who had bought the right to exact fines for the effusion of blood, adultery, and theft, up to four pennies, while the greater fines went to their lord, the abbot of Ramsey.¹ This does not mean, of course, that these socmen had a court of their own, nor is it, in itself, necessarily a proof that the fines were levied in the manorial court of Brenton belonging to the abbot. But it certainly supposes organized action and organized supervision on the part of these socmen as a body. In fact, they appear in the same position as holders of a franchise, in regard to the abbot, as he occupied himself in a higher sphere as against the king. It may be said at once that the socmen above mentioned could exercise their right most naturally as legal suitors of the court of Broughton.

The Domesday Survey does not very often go into such details as to rights acquired by bodies of men subject to great lords, but some characteristic instances of the same kind as the Broughton one it does mention.²

The effect of the granting of jurisdictional franchises is described in a few cases rather fully, because there were some special features connected with it. Thus we hear that several great men in Berkshire had retained the gafol which they ought to have paid from their houses, and had a right to the fines in cases of bloodshed, or reception of strangers before they were delivered to the reeve, as well as adultery and theft, when all these offences were committed within the precincts of their houses. As to other wites, they went to the king.¹ In this case only remission of the fiscal due is stipulated. In the description of Dunwich, the private jurisdiction arising out of such cases is more clearly seen. The manor has to be represented in the hundred court by two or three of the tenants, but thieves caught in the place had to stand their trial in it, and as for corporal justice (cases involving corporal punishment) it had to be administered in Bliebury, a capital manor of Robert Malet, the tenant-in-chief.²

But the common and well-known manner in which grants of private jurisdiction were made was, of course, the insertion of the famous sac and soc (sake and soke) clause in a charter conveying property. The first points to the deciding of cases (sake); the second to the suit the men subjected to the jurisdiction had to do with the court.³ Thus sake and soke is literally case and suit, a very appropriate conjunction of terms, which lays stress both on the passive and on the active side of the relation which was created by the franchise for those who came under its application. They had to submit to decisions, and they had to attend a private tribunal competent to give such decisions, and eventually to take part in its jurisdiction as judges or members of inquest juries. Needless to add, the fundamental formula acquired a somewhat different meaning when applied to the lord's exercise of judicial right and collection of its profits. He received, or had, sake and soke in the sense of a privilege to exercise jurisdiction. I need not dwell on the amplifications of the formula: Toll, team, infangennetheof, utfangennetheof, flymenafeorm, are the most frequent adjuncts, all terms which have been often and sufficiently explained, both in glossaries and pleas, and in the books of modern commentators.¹ Let us merely take notice that in some instances the contrast between sac and soc, as the ordinary attributes of private jurisdiction, and forisfacturae, as important cases mostly reserved to the Crown, is expressly drawn and insisted upon. From the combination of the two arose the different degrees of manorial justice in so far as it deals with criminal and police matters. A case in point is presented, e. g., by the rule about the trial of thieves in Southwark. If a man was accused on the spot ('in flagranti') he paid his fine to the king; if he left the place without being accused, and, we must add, I suppose, was brought up for trial afterwards, his fine went to the lord of the manor, the bishop of Bayeux.² In Alverstone, Warwick, the predecessor of the bishop of Worcester had sake and soke, and team, and church-scot, and all fines, except the four forfeitures which the king had all through the realm.¹

Noteworthy cases arise when sake and soke include rights to fines imposed by a hundred or a wapentake. It is not easy to distinguish them clearly from the normal forfeitures, and they may be occasionally treated as such. Yet the crucial fact of the appropriation of fines by a private lord, on the ground of his being possessed of soke as to land, or to men, within the hundred, or even in regard to the hundred itself, is seen to be at the bottom of the arrangement.²

One of the difficulties in reading the older evidence arises from the fact that it is not always clear whether the grant of sake and soke, of forfeitures, or of pleas (placita), is to be construed as a grant of judicial functions, or of leave to collect and appropriate fines. Domesday, and documents of the same kind, are chiefly interested in the latter side, and therefore they are seldom very explicit in regard to the former. Indeed, there are cases in which it can be shown that the actual trial and delivery of the sentence took place in the hundred court, but the men more directly concerned in it stepped out to form a special quorum.³ But this is evidently a transitional stage, and as a rule the grants of sake and soke led to the formation of separate manorial courts. This is implied in the very name of the privileged holders of sake and soke in Danish places like Lincoln and Stamford; they are designated as laymen-judges, a common Scandinavian expression for persons exercising the right of declaring the law and administering justice.¹ In the west, which appears strongly feudalized already at the time of Domesday, a manor like Persore, belonging to St. Peter of Westminster, is said to yield an income of £83 with the pleas of the freemen.² These freemen, or franklins, would correspond to the socmen of the Danish districts, and, to judge by the description of the manor, some of the villains of the place must have been included in the class, as personally free, or descended from a group which had to be distinguished from the serfs in point of jurisdiction. However this may be, the pleas in question can hardly be taken in the sense of judicial profits only. They may have accrued to the manor as a result of the judicial functions of the hundred attached to it, but they appear characteristically as an attribute of the manor itself, and are on entirely the same footing with similar pleas proceeding from grants of sake and soke. A case of the same kind is that of the huge manor of Taunton³ in Somerset, to which many of the most important franchises appertained. Three times a year the tenants had to attend to hold the pleas of the bishop without summons; the pennies from the hundred jurisdiction are included in the customary dues to the Bishop of Winchester, but they are only one of his many privileges there. The reciprocity of the collection of dues and the performance of functions is very clear in such conspicuous cases, and it is not less apparent in instances where the natural relation of the estate to higher units was for some reason ambiguous or complicated. It might happen that a township was attributed to one district for the purpose of rents and service, and belonged to another in regard to geld and to the holding of pleas. This is noticed sometimes in a way which leaves no doubt as to the intimate connexion between judicial profits and jurisdiction. Thirteen hides of Martley and five hides of Sucheley have to pay geld and to hold pleas in Dodintre Hundred, Worcestershire, although their farm is in Herefordshire.¹ Even more explicit is the statement in respect of two hides in Kingston, Herefordshire;² they pay geld and do work in Gloucestershire, but their tenants are bound to attend pleas, in order to do and to receive right, in the Hundred of Bremese, Herefordshire. In fact, the juridical side of jurisdiction cannot be conveniently separated from its fiscal side; those who get the profits have to do the work, and, as we have said before, every grant of sake comes to be a grant of soke. The fine follows investigation and sentence, and in order to investigate and to give sentence, not a single judge, but suitors forming a court are needed. An allusion to this primary requirement of the holding of pleas may be found in the often quoted passage about the Sheriff Picot, who accommodated a couple of socmen 'propter placita sua tenenda.' It is not clear whether the 'sua' means 'their' or 'his'. More likely the first, if we may judge from the cases quoted above, but the private court with the privilege of holding certain pleas, and a certain number of suitors necessary for its existence, is certainly before us on this occasion.¹

persons.

3. The Domesday Survey is full of references to soke. Apart from some special cases which will have to be examined hereafter, these references may be considered from two points of view. They speak of certain rights, and they speak of certain territorial divisions. Turning to the first group, we find, to begin with, that the king is often mentioned as exercising soke over men or over places. The description of Norwich² is a good instance in point. Of 1,320 of its burgesses 1,238 were in the soke and sake of the king and of the earl, and they had to pay customary rents or to perform corresponding services; over 50 Archbishop Stigand had sake and soke and commendation, and over 32 Harold. Besides 1,238 burgesses in the common soke of the king and earl, there was one tenant of the king who was 'to that degree' under his lordship that he could not leave nor do homage to any one without permission from the king. The mention of this single very dependent burgess is not without importance, because it throws light on the position of the rest, who were evidently able to do what was denied to him. They could not be called 'ita dominici'—to that degree—under his lordship as he was. Indeed, their dependence on the king and the earl would be considered nowadays merely as the obligation of subjects in regard to public authority. The mediaeval Survey puts it as a subjection to the soke and sake of king and earl, subjection to the jurisdiction of the ordinary public authorities. Hardly different was the position of the tenants of 113 houses in Warwick, who held under the king, in contrast to the 112 who held of the king's barons. All had to pay geld, but the former resided in the king's demesne.³ This is, however, an inference suggested by a comparison with cases like that of Norwich, as sake and soke are not expressly mentioned. Such express references to holdings and land in the soke of the king are of common occurrence,¹ as well as others where the royal soke is said to stretch over certain persons, more especially over freemen or over sokemen.² Of special interest are cases when this royal soke is said to be transferred by express grant to a private person, a great lay lord or an ecclesiastical foundation. There is, e.g., the famous passage which tells us that five hides in Broughton were land belonging to socmen, but King Edward gave both the land and the soke to St. Benet of Ramsey in acknowledgement of a service which Abbot Aluuin had rendered to him in Saxony.³ In Norfolk it happened that some freemen over whom King Edward had soke and sake were appropriated by force by Guerth, Harold's brother. King William granted to the monastery of Bury St. Edmunds, along with the manor, the sake and soke of all the freemen of Guerth, and therefore the monks claim the persons in question.⁴ A similar contention arose about the freemen of Mulcelsel.⁵ We trace here very clearly the passage of men, whom we should have called ordinary citizens, under the sway of private jurisdiction, and the Broughton instance seems especially eloquent, because it discloses motives and proceedings which remind us of the innumerable grants of land made in Anglo-Saxon charters ; it is not only the soke that is passed in this case, but also the land and people get subjected, at one stroke, to a feudal lordship as a reward for services rendered by a magnate to the Crown. Similar services were of everyday occurrence, both in the State and the Church, and on the other hand the great fund for the distribution of rewards was undoubtedly the land of the kingdom, with its various dues. And proceeds of jurisdiction stood on a par with agricultural rents and services as a source of income at the disposal of the authorities.¹ Another group of entries which also shows clearly the passage of valuable political rights from the king to the lords are the passages bearing on the transfer of the jurisdiction in the hundreds. If we look at the nomina villarum list² we get sufficient material to judge of the extent to which hundreds had come into private hands.

¹ This is a source of difficulty in interpretation and of ambiguity in the use of the term. Although the intimate connexion with jurisdiction is sufficiently clear in most cases, in some the term 'soke' is taken to imply all the rights accruing to the king from his subjects. These include claims on their assistance for mustering the host, contributions to royal progresses and farms of right, and, possibly, some rents and services. By granting the soke the king may grant all such rights or a part of them. This meaning of the term may be illustrated both from Domesday and from preconquestual evidence. E.g. Edgar's charter to Ely, probably forged, but in accordance with the legal customs of the time. (Thorpe, Dipl. 242) : ' Ic þa geeacnode to þære ærran sylene ten þusenda ælfixa ælce geara þam munecum, þe me for fyrdinge gefyrndagum aras binnan þam iggoðe of þam folce æt Wyllan, and ealle þa socna eac ofer þet fennland into þam twam hundredum him to scrudfultume, . . . eac ealle þa socna ofer fif hundredum, and ofer ealle þa land, gelice ða socna ðe into þam mynstre nu synd begytene oððe ða þe him gyt becomað þurh Cristes foresceawunge, oððe þurh ceap, oððe þurh gife, habbon hi æfre on eallum þa socne, and þone feorðan pening on folclrice steore into Grantabrigc be minre unnan . and gif ænig man þis awendan wille, þonne gange eal seo socn þe to anre niht feorme gebyreð into þære stowe.'—The last stipulation seems rather an astonishing way of introducing a penal clause, but whatever we may think of its juridical character, the term 'socna to anre niht feorme' is characteristic by itself : it points to contributions in kind to a knight's farm. Cf. Dd. i. 368 a : (Sumerdebi) 'hec soca talis erat quod nihil reddebat, sed adiuuabat in exercitu regis in terra et in mari.' This use of the term 'soke' has led Mr. Ballard, as it seems to me, to formulate a somewhat exaggerated theory as to soke in opposition to sake and soke. Domesday Inquest, 84, 159 ff. Cf. Maitland, Domesday Book and Beyond, 67 ff., 76 ff.

In Domesday we see the process of such transfer in its actual course of development. To begin with, even when hundreds are retained in the king's hands they may be merged into the administration of a royal manor. Such was the case with the Hundred of Grenehov, Norfolk, e. g., it was attached to the manor of Wiston (Wistune).¹ Then come the constant notices of the attribution of this or the other hundred, or of two, three, eight, twenty-seven of them, to a great lord or a see or a monastery.² These are well-known facts, and I only mention them because they illustrate the meaning and application of soke, or sake and soke, as a right to jurisdiction.

Some cases of grants of soke require special notice—namely, the cases when a place, or some persons, are said to be exempted from it, or quit of it, as it is expressed in the Survey. The expression is suggested clearly by the corresponding 'reddere socam,'³ to render soke, meaning the payment of certain dues accruing from jurisdiction. But what is the aim of the quit-claim? Clearly it could not be an entire abolition of fines and wites, as this would have had the worst effect on the grantees. There can be hardly a doubt that they were left in such a case to manage their judicial affairs themselves, and to collect the fines for themselves. Whether they could alter the amount and character of such fines may be doubtful if we look only to Domesday, but the wealth of material presented by borough custumals and other records of local custom points to a very free exercise of customary legislation in connexion with the growth of franchises.¹ Perhaps the most interesting instance entered in Domesday is that of Dover,² which was pardoned 'sake and soke' as a reward for the fitting out of twenty ships, for fifteen days in the year, twenty-one men serving in every ship. A similar buying-off of sake and soke seems implied by the service of the sea performed by the men of Romney. The term 'frigsoca' ³ that sometimes occurs in Lincolnshire points to authority over freemen as opposed to 'burgeriht'—rights over gebúrs.

The socmen so frequently mentioned in Domesday, and the socagers, or tenants-in-socase, of later days, seem naturally to be men under soke, and men doing soke. suitors. The question gets to be a somewhat complicated one, because the right of soke may be taken so differently, as we have already had occasion to notice—there is the soke of the king, and that of magnates, and that of communities which have acquired the franchise. Besides, it is not only socmen who are under soke and have to do suit, but also freemen (liberi), and villains too.¹ Some of the points bearing on the question will have to be discussed in the chapter on Socmen; I should like on the present occasion merely to call attention to the fact that rights of soke over socmen are often granted in the same way as rights over freemen.² Sometimes the right is divided, and this can hardly mean anything else than that the profits accruing from suit of court and from fines for non-attendance, as well as for transgression, had to be divided equally between two lords,³ one of them being

¹ The capital distinction between certain and uncertain tenure in feudal common law amounted to a refusal of judicial protection to villains, while to socmen such protection was granted (Villainage in England, 114). This feature led to a modification of the doctrine in regard to socage tenure. It came to be considered chiefly from the point of view of certainty of tenure and service. But originally the tenure is certainly connected with the term and institution of the soke as franchise—a portion of public authority either residing in the ordinary royal officials and district courts or granted to a subject. Many traces of that and of the suit (secta) corresponding to it are to be found in later documents. Rot. Hund. ii. 301: (Notts) 'Et adhuc de eodem wapentak habet soka de Dunham duos turnos de omnibus tenentibus suis per annum, et semper habuerunt postquam primo fuerunt de dominio domini Regis et valent illi duo turni per annum 20 s.' ii. 313 (Arnhall), 318 (Orston); ii. 177 (Suffolk), 'Omnes isti pre-nominati sunt aquitati de mурdro et de communibus misericordiis et de omnibus misis que pertinent ad dominum Regem que pertinent ad hundredum et capiunt emendaciones de braciatoribus et non habent tumberellum exceptis Holebroc et Selfeye.' possibly the king. One curious case has been preserved in which the socman was free, not only to sell his land, but to sell his soke.¹ His position was in every way exceptional, as there were five others in the same place who could only alienate their land. The only possible explanation which such a remarkable right may receive seems to consist in the leave to transfer land, with all the rights accruing from its possession in regard to jurisdiction, while in the case of a sale of land by any of the fellows of this socman the right to jurisdiction remained as before. It is in any case a very unusual privilege. There may have been definite limitations to such a licence of trading in public allegiance, but we are not told what these limitations were.

It is not difficult to see how uncertain and open to misunderstandings and encroachments the arrangements derived from the right of soke were. The jurisdictional privilege of the lord crossed, as it were, several other lines of superiority which led to the collection of dues and profits, and it was by no means easy to disentangle the meshes of these concurrent rights to exploitation, especially as they resembled each other very much in concrete particulars, and were, very often, wielded by the same person. The surveys of the eastern counties, drawn up after recent Danish invasions, and therefore not reduced to the more colourless uniformity of those of counties settled from old times, abound in references to the confusion and conflicts resulting from the co-existence of several forms of superiority. A place in which the inhabitants paid dues in commutation for the casual fines derived from soke might easily be taken for a settlement of tenants paying customary rent. A free-man, attached to a lord by voluntary commendation, might occasionally be drawn into a circle of men bound to recognize the jurisdiction of this same lord. In a dispute with regard to the ownership of a manor or of a holding, it might be material to discover whether the Saxon 'antecessor' of the Norman claiming the land was, really, possessed of land, or only held soke over its tenants, or perhaps was merely entitled to a claim to commendation. I only mention a few of the possible queries and complications in order to explain the stress laid, in some parts of the Domesday Survey, on the exact distinctions between commendation, soke, land-ownership and customary dues.¹ We shall have to come back to the subject in other connexions. I should like to point now to the fact that the great variety of conditions and privileges is distinctly traceable, in a general way, although not in every single case, to Old English antecedents, working on different though converging lines. The Norman age reduced this variety to somewhat simpler combinations, but did not succeed in getting rid of it entirely.

Territorial
soke.

4. The relation bound up with the right to sake and soke is, in principle, a personal one. Certain persons are exempted from the ordinary jurisdiction of the hundred and of the shire, and placed under the jurisdiction of a great man or of a great institution. These exempted persons may be taken, and mentioned, singly or in batches, but the character and limitations of their new subjections will be derived from the nature of every single grant, and is not necessarily bound up with any general scheme of local government and local repartition of rights of jurisdiction. Therefore the relation may sometimes assume a shape very similar to personal commendation. But there is one feature which separates it clearly from this last, and forms a link between the personal and the territorial aspect of the right to sake and soke. It is not regardless of any relation to land that one is subjected to the right, but as the tenant of some land—a holding, an estate—or as one temporarily connected with some land, one who dwells on it, or who has committed some specified action on it, e.g. a theft. This side of the attribution of soke makes it akin to land-ownership, and necessitates careful distinctions in some instances. And, on the other hand, the juxtaposition of soke privileges in respect of scattered tenants tends to resolve itself into territorial combinations, to concentrate into local jurisdictions. Let us take a case from Lincolnshire. Robert of Stafford claims that the land of Outi, a vassal of Archbishop Thomas, ought to lie in the soke of Lepsi, his own predecessor, but the wapentake says that they never saw Outi render soke to Lepsi. The test of the contention is transferred to evidence of a personal, customary duty, which, in this case, seems to have been a commutation rent, but the claim is directed to include a certain holding into a local district called Soke¹.

The building up of more or less compact franchises was

facilitated by the very common occurrence of a grant of privileged jurisdiction, in regard to whole townships,¹ or manors, with all their population,² or all the lands and men belonging to a lord.³ But there are numbers of cases when stray hides or carucates, or a church, or a wood, are connected by soke with some manor to which they do not otherwise belong, and from which they may lie at a considerable distance;⁴ or are attributed as to soke to a person

It is difficult for us nowadays to understand how such a fractional privilege could be realized, but mediaeval arrangements very commonly assumed the shape of similar subdivisions, as we have already had occasion to observe in the matter of military obligations.² These scattered privileges explain the often-recurring statement of the Survey that the soke of a certain place, or of certain holdings in it, belongs to or lies in another place.³ Conversely, some manorial estates are surrounded by whole swarms of smaller settlements, hamlets, or holdings in other villis, which are expressly designated as their sokes.⁴ In Derbyshire, Nottinghamshire, Hertfordshire, these subordinate sokes are marked off in the margin by an S, to which the full 'soka' corresponds as a heading.⁵ The opposition between the manor, as the economic unit of an estate, and the soke, as the jurisdictional union encircling the manor and often consisting of places scattered around it, is one of the important results of the different modes by which lords acquired rights of superiority over their dependents.¹ Brictric, the son of Alfgar, held a hide in Beadun from the Bishop of Worcester, and contributed to the manorial farm in proportion to his holding, but he also rendered to the soke of the bishop everything he was bound to perform in service to the king. The expression 'soke', in this case, may be stretched to a somewhat wider extent than usual, or else it may be simply an inexact rendering of the usual surrender of jurisdiction. But however this may be, the contrast between the two forms of contribution which might be levied from a hide holding—one to the farm of the manor, the other to the customary dues of the soke; one economic, the other political—is well accentuated by the entry.² In a Suffolk case we read that three freemen were unable to sell their land at all, while two others could only sell within the precincts of the Soke of St. Edmunds.³ The closing of a soke against strangers is parallel to a similar phenomenon within the more narrow circuit of a manor, but the boundaries of the two do not coincide.

Organization of

A jurisdictional centre is necessary for the constitution of a soke, although cases occur when it is not easy to make out where it lay.¹ This points to a feature especially common in Lincolnshire, namely, to the congregation of enormous numbers of free settlements around a jurisdictional centre which has no importance whatever as a manorial unit. In Caistor, in Grantham,² there is hardly any domain to speak of: these huge lordships are emphatically sokes, and the central place appears chiefly in the light of a meeting-place for the court of the franchise. This is not the rule everywhere, of course, and sometimes a soke gets superadded to very important manors. In Harold's manor of Bernodeby³ there is already a manorial nucleus of three carucates in domain in Bernodeby itself, and two carucates in Riby, an inland or berwick of the manor. In the Derbyshire possessions of the abbey of Burton⁴ the manorial element is still more prominent.

The facts that sokes may appear as outside adjuncts of manors, and, at the same time, that rights of sac and soc contribute powerfully to the formation of the franchise of the manor, have their counterpart in the extension of soke over very different elements of the population. It stretches naturally over socmen and freemen, and in most cases, which are marked off as special sokes, we find *socmen*¹ or *freemen*² forming the bulk of the population. Villains and bordarii, if any, appear as their under-tenants. And yet there are numbers of cases where villains are found to be resident in *sokes*³ or under soke, and any normal manor provided with the ordinary sake and soke franchise would of course include villains, and might perhaps consist of villains alone or of other elements of the population reputed unfree according to mediaeval Common Law.⁴ These facts explain themselves in so far as manor and soke overlap without coinciding; the latter ought to be restricted to rights of jurisdictional or public origin, while the former comprises both jurisdictional and economic elements. But the local influence of the lord easily extended beyond the strict measure of rights conceded to him by the grant of franchise, and we commonly find socmen gradually drawn on into the closer bonds of manorial subjection. In some cases they at least held their own as socage tenants of the manor, but there were other instances in which they lapsed into the same state of bondage as the villains. We shall have to revert to these phenomena when treating of the classes of the population, but it is important to note at the outset, and in connexion with the subject of territorial jurisdiction, that there is material contrast in the treatment of this institution in the north and in the south of England. In the north, including the East Anglian shires, the soke appears as a recognized separate institution, and, parallel to it, numerous socmen and freemen under soke represent a fundamentally free population, subjected to political exactions of various kinds, but preserving its high social standing on the basis of suit to the courts of the sokes. In the south the soke is almost entirely merged into the manor, while socmen and freemen appear only exceptionally, and the court of the manor has to attend to all jurisdictional business. At the same time the sake and soke basis of the manorial franchise is quite as clear as in the case of the Scandinavian shires, in fact clearer, because most of the Old English charters come from the southern counties. Have we to suppose entirely different courses of development in the two cases, or to say that the Saxon south had gone through approximately the same stages as the Scandinavian north, but had already arrived in the eleventh century at the goal reached by the northern districts only in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, under the influence of the Normans? I think that a survey of the grants of sac and soc made in the tenth and eleventh centuries establishes more than a presumption that the second eventuality actually took place. This means that a number of men who are technically entered as villains in Domesday were ceorls under soke in earlier times, and that their complete fusion with the servile elements of the population is more the result of terminology and encroachment than of a fundamental difference in the conditions and development of the two halves of England. In any case, in the feudal age the contrast seems to be to a great extent removed even in the counties of the former Danelaw. Former sokes are currently treated as manors, and their franchises discussed in the same way in the north as in the south.¹

Yet interesting points remain even in later evidence to show the original difference between the two institutions—a jurisdictional district attached to an estate, and an estate acquiring some rights of jurisdiction. One of the best later records of the organization of sokes is the thirteenth-century custumal of Rothley, in Leicestershire.² The manor is kept distinct from the surrounding members, which are spread over a surface of some square miles,³ exactly in the same way as the sokes of Derbyshire, Nottingham, and Lincoln are said to surround the centre or head of the soke in the Domesday Survey. The manorial court, held, as usual, every three weeks, and, if necessary,⁴ more often, could evidently clear only the purely juridical part of the business incumbent on the townships of the district. There was no constant centre for it; it could be moved by the reeve from one member of the soke to another according to the necessities of the case, although probably it met most frequently in Rothley, the manorial centre of the franchise. This point puts into strong light one of the most important features of the soke arrangement. Being primarily a jurisdictional one, it was not contrived to fit the economic requirements of the lordship. It was not necessary to have a close and meddling supervision over the husbandry of the peasants so far as services were concerned, because there were few services in kind, mostly carriage dues, the rest being already acquitted in money in the thirteenth century.¹ There remained, to be sure, the multifarious by-laws and economic arrangements made necessary by open-field cultivation, commons, &c. As the manorial court was taken up with other business, and could not pretend to local knowledge, it is especially clear in such cases that the by-laws were drafted and enforced by local meetings and local officers, whatever they may have been called. The case stands exactly on a parallel with the halimotes of the bishop of Durham, to which one great manorial court was superimposed,² and with the placita of the Lancashire reeves in the huge manors among which the thanes and drengs of the district were distributed.³ By the side of the hundreds and of the purely jurisdictional sittings of manorial courts the necessity of meetings of some sort, to draw up by-laws and to appoint rural officers and juries, must have asserted itself. And the same may be said about all very large manorial combinations of this period, of which there are many, especially when they take the shape of sokes, that is of organizations of tenants emphatically free. The manorial jurisdiction remained a necessary item of the arrangement in so far as it had to sanction and to enforce the fines and punishments necessary to uphold economic order. The Rothley custumal formulates specific limitations in this respect. The fines for transgression and minor offences of different kinds imposed by the manorial court were not to exceed half a mark.¹

The social substratum of the whole fabric of the soke was a numerous population of free peasants. More than 200 socmen's holdings are enumerated in Domesday in this particular instance.² The thirteenth-century custumal presents an even larger free population of rent-paying peasants occupying virgates and bovates. Their labour services are few and not burdensome. The rule of succession admits of equality between sons, to the exclusion of daughters³ if there is male issue, yet the regularity of the holdings⁴ makes it probable that a customary policy of buying out younger sons and of keeping the holdings from extreme subdivision must have been pursued by the tenants. No dispersion of the same sort as we find in the case of Kentish gavelkind is noticeable in Rothley.

far as they have come down from later centuries, show sometimes, as an interesting feature reminding us of former conditions, a sharp contrast between the free and unfree tenants, the socmen, and the nativi or villani. This is very much the case, e. g., in the rolls of Hartington,¹ in Derbyshire. Originally these rolls constantly distinguish between the inquisitions held by freemen and by villains, while later on the opposition is expressed in a subdivision of the manorial court into a socage and a bondage portion.

Summary. The principal results of the chapter on jurisdiction may perhaps be summarized in the following manner :—

1. All departments of English law in the eleventh century were very much under the influence of provincial custom. More especially as regards jurisdiction, status, and tenure, investigators have to reckon materially with the varieties of jurisprudence practised by the different shire-moots.

2. The hundred was originally intended to be an association of a hundred citizen householders exercising full rights and primarily responsible for the administration of justice, the defence of the country, and taxation. The body of the suitors of the hundred became differentiated into the group of landowners and that of deputies of the townships.

3. The passage from the Old English to the feudal system of government is characterized, among other things, by the break-up of the popular courts and the surrender of public authority to numerous holders of franchises.

4. The term soke appears in the sense of a suit to a court or to a lordship, of authority over a district, and of a franchise or of a customary payment to it.

5. The surrender of profits accruing from a public function like jurisdiction necessarily leads to the formation of private courts. The ordinary courts could not be expected to perform duties the profits of which had to be given away.

6. The soke over persons appears as an earlier stage in the formation of territorial franchises.

7. The soke and the manor are institutions of the same kind, and are both derived from the delegation of political authority by the kings. But the soke represents more especially the relation between a jurisdictional lord and the free suitors of his court, while in the manor the political attributions of lordship are indissolubly blended with land-ownership and the authority of a master over serfs.

8. The peculiar treatment of soke in the Anglo-Danish counties corresponds to the great strength of the free elements of the population in those districts. It suggests comparisons with earlier stages in the evolution of society in the Anglo-Saxon south-west of the country.

SECTION III : TAXATION

CHAPTER I

THE GELD

taxation.

I. ONE of the most remarkable features of the history of England is the early development of taxation in this country. While other European states were slowly struggling to evolve taxation for common purposes, and while their sovereigns were still almost entirely dependent on the scanty revenue of feudal aids and occasional subsidies,¹ England presented comparatively a very advanced system of direct taxes. This was hardly felt as a blessing by the population; indeed, the sources are full of lamentations about the insufferable burden of imposts. And yet the fact that the kings were able to collect these taxes testifies to a considerable stress of political energy, if one may say so, and to an extraordinary concentration of state power, which became the starting-point of many other national advantages for England. This early concentration was wrung from the people by the tremendous efforts and sufferings of the Danish wars; but the ravages of Norsemen had been felt all over Europe, and yet in no other place did they call forth such a systematic activity in the matter of building up a financial organization, and nowhere else did the prosperity of the Royal Exchequer outlive the cessation of hostilities in the Norman wars.

The eventful period which gave England its monarchical centralization and its popular liberties begins, in a way, with the careful regulation of the fiscal system in the eleventh century, with fiscal measures which turned the Danegeld into a regular tax instead of an extraordinary imposition. The decisive turn was evidently taken under Canute, when the tax changed its destination, although it retained its name, or rather when it was perpetuated in order to consolidate the Anglo-Danish state, and to defend it against further invasions. During the struggle between English, Danes, and Frenchmen in Edward the Confessor's time it could not be dispensed with,¹ and William the Conqueror took it up with all the energy which in every respect characterized his rule. The Survey, to which we owe our most precious information in regard to English institutions and society, is mainly directed towards ascertaining the data for the imposition and repartition of geld. It became the invaluable cadastre which we know because such a cadastre was wanted by the officers of the king's Exchequer to check returns and to effect necessary modifications of the tax.

I do not intend to treat at length of the various sources of revenue existing by the side of the geld. Their meaning and relative importance are sufficiently known. It is necessary, however, to point out briefly the main distinctions between the terms used, as in concrete cases of interpretation it may be sometimes doubtful what is meant by our authorities. Apart from indirect contributions like toll² or market dues,¹ from the coinage regality,² and from the proceeds of justice, including bots and fines for non-attendance,³ the public revenue fell, at the end of the Saxon period, under three main heads, and these subdivisions continue to be traceable after the Conquest. There were : (1) customary payments in kind and in money,⁴ (2) ordinary land taxes, and (3) extraordinary impositions. As to the first, they were levied in different ways, as food rents, carriage service, housing and quartering duties, or substitutes for them, and represent the most ancient and the simplest form of assessment. They occur in private economy,⁵ but supply also means of providing for the needs of the royal household, of the army, and of public officers. Sometimes we hear of liveries on definite occasions,⁶ and sometimes of systematic collections for the king's progress or for the 'feorm', the maintenance of his household or of those of his servants during a single night or several nights.⁷ The 'averages'⁸—driving and carrying duties—and the ward penny,¹ for which inward²—domestic guard—duties were commuted, represent two varieties of the same customary services.

The second species of direct fiscal imposition consisted of permanent taxes laid directly on houses or holdings—the land-gable or gafol.³ It is sometimes difficult to distinguish in this case between rents payable to landlords and actual taxes,⁴ but there can be no doubt that the gafol existed with the latter meaning from very early times.⁵ Indeed it was perhaps cocval with the very establishment of English rule in the island. Still, it is not this ordinary land-tax that developed into the later system of flexible fiscal contributions, but the extraordinary impositions. Of these several were in use during the Domesday period. Sometimes a *gersuma*⁶ was exacted by the lord of the manor as a kind of general subsidy from his subject, and it might by repetition get to be a yearly payment, although originally it was certainly meant to be occasional. The tailgia, tallagium,⁷ expressly mentioned in the north-east, and commonly alluded to in manorial documents of the feudal age, originated probably also in extraordinary taxation by the local lords.

In direct opposition to these local rates stands the geld, the common geld, the Danegeld levied by the king. It is the most sweeping and the heaviest of all the taxes in the eleventh century.⁸ From being an extraordinary subsidy it becomes gradually the main common tax of the realm, and loses at the same time a good deal of its importance, because its payment gets to be on the one hand a matter of course, a canon,¹ while on the other, frequent exemptions make it less and less burdensome. In this sense it appears later on as the hidagium.² In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries two new extraordinary imposts arose by its side, scutage in commutation of military service, and *carucage*³ as a kind of revival of the original Danegeld in great emergencies, with the object of getting contributions from the entire agricultural area of the kingdom.

Fiscal
units.

2. After glancing at the general fiscal scheme of the beginning of the feudal period, let us turn to the geld, the principal tax of the Domesday Survey. Its fundamental feature is the assessment according to fiscal units called hides, carucates, and sulungs. The tax is not laid directly on the estates according to their value or income, but the districts, localities, and properties are estimated at a certain number of units, and the sum of the geld has to be distributed according to those.⁴ There is one exception to this rule, namely, the assessment of East Anglia, where every pound of the tax was divided among the estates forming a hundred in certain proportions.¹ Even there carucates and their subdivisions are mentioned,² although it is difficult to make out at this stage of our inquiry what the meaning of this second series of notices was, whether they were traces of a former fiscal arrangement displaced by a new mode of distribution, or whether they still had some significance for purposes of assessment in regard to one or other kind of service. We shall have to come back to this question by-and-by; at present it is sufficient to take note of the fact that the system of assessment units is not entirely absent even from Norfolk and Suffolk, although a different mode of repartition is in practical use by the side of it.

When we consider this method of estimating the rateable value of properties by equating it to a certain number of units, or fractions of these units, one main line of differentiation strikes the eye at once. Although the object of the formation of such cadastral units is seemingly the same throughout England, and although they are all formed ultimately of acres—fiscal acres or geld acres, of course—they appear under three different names, as solins in Kent, as carucates in the north and east of England, and as hides everywhere else. Evidently the fiscal standard had not been unified in the kingdom, although such a unification would have presented very great advantages from the fiscal point of view. Indeed, the king's fiscal advisers must have found it rather difficult to distribute the geld fairly among different provinces in which the units of assessment in use were not identical. Nor do we possess the key to all the methods of reduction which were used by the Exchequer at this time. Indeed, in order to get rid of this awkward stumbling-block on the very threshold of the inquiry some of our best guides have supposed that the sulung, hide, and carucate, though different in name, were actually identical in their fiscal value, and subdivided in the same way into fractions, each geld hide, or geld carucate containing an exact correspondence with agrarian measures — 4 virgates, 8 bovates, and 120 acres, while the solin (sulung) was partitioned into yokes instead of virgates, but was also equated to 120 acres.¹ This being assumed, all statistical calculations in regard to Domesday data proceed on the convenient basis of a single fiscal standard. Unfortunately, matters are not so simple. As the formal correspondence between agrarian and fiscal units has to be granted, we have at once to recognize in the solin a peculiar Kentish standard considerably larger than the hide or carucate of 120 acres; it contained from 180 to 200 acres, and may even have been reckoned at 240 acres if its two hundreds were to be taken as long hundreds.² The jugum (yoke), as its fourth part, comprised consequently

² My paper on 'Sulung and Hide', E. H. R. 1904. In Dd. i. 2 b (Possessio Sti. Martini) 450 acres are equated to 2½ solins, making the solin 180 acres. The Kentish portion of the Surrey manor of Meretone (Merton) is estimated in solins. Dd. i. 30 b: 'Episcopus Lisoienensis tenet in Chent ii solins qui huic manerio adiacuerunt.' In the Survey of Litelcert 2½ hides take the place of 3 solins in the time of William the Conqueror, but this may be a mistake of the scribe compiling the returns. At any rate, the instance is entirely isolated. Dd. i. 5 a: (Little Chart, Kent) 'Ipse Archiepiscopus tenet Litelcert, T. R. E. se defendit pro iii solins et modo pro ii hidis et dimidia.'

50 or even 60 acres.¹ Evidently we have to deal in this case not with an artificial unit suited to the Great Inquests of William the Conqueror's reign, but a provincial standard derived from a provincial local unit of long standing.²

The difference between the hide and the carucate is not so apparent. Indeed, it seems clear that in many, and perhaps in most, cases both were used in the sense of a group of 120 fiscal acres.³ And yet some explanation of the fact that the terms were different has to be found, and is not difficult to find.⁴ The carucate is evidently a measure employed in the shires held by Danes and Norsemen; it stands in a much more immediate relation to the field carucate, the carucata ad arandum, than the fiscal hide,⁵ and it is natural to see in this mode of fiscal appreciation the result of a survey which aimed at substituting actual field units for the artificial measures of former times, which had swerved greatly from their agrarian types and were further confused by the Invasion.⁶ The carucated north of England is the land of the Norse people, and the suggestion that it was, as such, contrasted with the hidated south seems a very appropriate one.⁷ The precise meaning

² Kentish Charters of the seventh, eighth, and ninth centuries are all consistently of aratra, while Mercian and West Saxon documents have 'manentes,' 'tributari,' 'cassati,' etc.

Geld hides. Not so with the hides. When we look more closely at the use of this term in Domesday we find a most confusing variety of meanings. Sometimes the hide appears in the sense of an artificial group of carucates. I have already had occasion to mention that in Lancashire six carucates were occasionally reckoned to the hide.³ From other entries in regard to the district between the Ribble and the Mersey it would seem that the ratio was not always the same, but that in any case the hide included several caru-

Hoc testantur Hugo et alii liberatores quod ita Radulfo concessit. Modo dicit Willelmus de Ow non se habere de hac terra nisi xxxii carucatas.' Cf. Round, Feudal England, 69 ff.

¹ This is made clear by the considerable divergences which occur between the number of geld carucates and team-lands on some estates. E.g. Dd. i. 281 a: 'S(oca) in Ordesdale i bouata terre ad geldum. Terra i carucae. Ibi ii sochemanni habent i carucam . . . S(oca) in Mortune et altera Mortune x bouatae terre ad geldum. Terre iv carucis. Ibi vii sochemanni et i bordarius habent iv carucas.'

² Eight bovates or oxgangs go without exception to the carucate.

cates.¹ At first glance one might guess that in this thinly populated and exposed region some of the public burdens had to be assessed on very large areas, and that an alleviation was effected in this respect by combining several geld carucates into the unit of a hide approximately equal as a rateable quantity to the hide of the southern provinces. This would be, however, a mere guess. In fact, a comparison with Leicestershire, which could not be regarded as exceptionally depopulated or in a difficult position, might lead one to infer that the term 'hide' was used in these cases without any regard to its ordinary fiscal repartition. Leicestershire hides are said to include 12, 14, 18 carucates and the like.² This would suggest a similar ratio in the case of the Lancashire 8 carucates superadded to the hides. It is not easy to realize the aim of such artificial combinations, but, besides being noteworthy in themselves, they are interesting, inasmuch as they show that the term hide could occasionally be used in a manner in which it was opposed to the carucate, and out of proportion with the ordinary meaning attached to it in the south.

In the south-west corner of England we come across a similar phenomenon, namely, hides, virgates, and ferlins, or fourth parts of virgates, constructed on a very large areal scale.³ On the other hand, we find geld carucates and geld acres of a peculiar standard. Cornwall is the only county using the carucate unit in the south, and this peculiarity is clearly derived from its wild, half-pastoral condition and Celtic tribal customs. Even without going much into details, we notice a reckoning in Cornish acres which correspond roughly to sixty-four English acres; they are sometimes used synonymously with carucates, and present the basis of the geld assessment of the county.¹ Both the hides and the acres are evidently a product of local conditions, and cannot be equated without further inquiry with their counterparts in Wessex or Mercia. Indeed, the authorities distinguish clearly Welsh hides and English hides,² not only here but in other districts on the Welsh border, and although the Welsh hides and Cornish acres are taken primarily as real agrarian units, enough has already been said on the question to enable us to draw the conclusion that the geld units were constructed on the same pattern. This is further corroborated by the subdivisions of the hide as they appear in Cornwall and other Celtic districts: it falls, not into virgates and half-virgates, but into virgates and ferlins³ or fourths, a scheme which does not fit with the usual reckoning of fifteen acres to the half-virgate. The ferlin goes well into a duodecimal system, but not into a decimal one.

In Devonshire the same conditions have left a trace in the very extensive areas assigned to the hide, or, conversely, in the very small fractions at which estates are being assessed.⁴ But I should not like to press this point

Another curious local variation is presented by a series of entries in the survey of Sussex. The hides appear there

¹ Dd. iv. 88 (Wodeberia, Devon); 120 (Waleurda, Devon); 454 (Hawkwell in Dulverton, Somerset), 'Ulfus habet i mansionem que uocatur Haukeuella quam ipsemet habuit et reddit gildum pro uirga et i fertino et pro quarta parte i fertini. Hanc possunt arare iii carrucae. Inde habet Rex in dominio tertiam unius uirge (sic) et i carrucam. Et uillani ii partes illius uirge et iii carrucas.' The usual English reckoning may have occurred by the side of a local Celtic one. On the other hand, ferdings occur sometimes in the north-east, but there they probably go back to Scandinavian practices based on the division of the Ból into ferdings and ottings. Cf. frequently equated with eight virgates.¹ I say frequently, because the usual reckoning of four virgates to the hide asserts itself also.² There occur also cases of entirely abnormal equations, which may have to be explained by a reduction of hidage without a corresponding reduction in the number of virgates.³ But the ratio of one hide to eight virgates seems too casual and too local at the same time to be accounted for in this way. A possible explanation, as it seems to me, might start from a comparison with the sulung of Kent. A double hide would be a match to it in Sussex, and there are actually traces of such a phenomenon.¹

When we take all these scattered facts into account, we can hardly escape the conclusion that the geld system of the hides was by no means reduced to one common denominator, but, on the contrary, disclosed everywhere traces of local peculiarities and variations. It was evidently not devised at one moment nor introduced at one stroke, and it had to serve the purpose of the local repartition of scot more than those of a general survey over the resources of the kingdom and the relative fiscal strength of its component parts. Three circumstances rendered it very unfit for the latter purpose: it was to a very great extent a record of antiquated repartition; it presented all sorts of local varieties; it was, moreover, traversed by an enormous number of exemptions and privileges, of which we shall have to speak more fully by and by. And yet the necessity of a general survey must have prompted to a large extent the compilation of the cadastre. What means did the government use in order to get a more or less accurate estimate of the fiscal capabilities of every district and estate? William the Conqueror's government had recourse to means which were often used later on by the Angevin kings: it numbered the ploughs actually used in tilling the land, and it exacted returns in regard to the quantity of land fit for arable, pasture, or other economic purposes.

3. The ploughing strength of the community was measured by the number of ploughs employed by it. ^{Team-}lands. I need not dwell on a point which has been entirely settled, and does not admit of controversy, in view of the clear and entirely concordant statements of the authorities.

The king's officers marked, not the ploughs as actually made up for tillage, but as groups or as fractions of a normal plough-team of eight oxen.¹ As a matter of fact, cows might be used instead of oxen; horses, or oxen and horses, might be yoked together, as is often described in cartularies.² Allusions to such variations from the usual course crop up in the Domesday Survey,³ but it holds firmly to the rule that the plough-teams mentioned in its statistics are equivalent to the eight-oxen teams, and treats the facts as to the actual 'heads', or animals which go to make them up, as entirely secondary.

Nor does the Survey make any attempt to describe the larger or smaller teams, although both kinds often occurred in practice; it notes them merely in groups of eight heads, or as fractions composed of a lesser number of heads, for example, two oxen or six oxen.⁴ The frequent instances of these fractional subdivisions may mean either that the holders of these fractions of teams had to join in order to start full ploughs, or else that they actually worked with smaller ploughs. The latter explanation seems the only appropriate one when, as is often the case, the six, four, three, or two oxen appear in separate hamlets, where it would be out of the question to find neighbours capable of joining to make up the team.⁵ But the Survey consistently abstains from giving to these smaller ploughs the designation of 'carucae': it enters them merely as 'boves'. This deprives us in many cases of the means of judging whether we have to deal with fractional items, to be made up into teams by co-ration, or with small ploughs, but the method is characteristic of the Survey, and is a very reasonable one; it gives the government a simple clue for the purpose of estimating the ploughing strength of estates and districts separately. Some uncertainty is also produced by the mode of entering cattle which served not for ploughing, but for milking, food, breeding, or carrying. In the detailed enumerations of the East Anglian and Exon. Domesday some at least of the stock used for these purposes are entered, but in the Exchequer Domesday this is not the case, as a rule,¹ and one cannot help thinking that part of the horned cattle, at least, must have been entered as teams according to the computation of eight heads to a team.² This very imperfect mode of enumeration evidently corresponds to a state of husbandry when there was not, as a matter of fact, much differentiation in the use of cattle, the same cows being often employed for milking and ploughing purposes, and the same oxen for drawing carts and ploughs.

Let us notice that in the case of carucages levied in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries the junction of teams is made one of the principles of assessment, and there can be no doubt that the normal team meant was the same eight-oxen team which presents the standard unit in Domesday.

But both in these carucages and in the Domesday Survey

a second unit of appreciation occurs, namely, the plough-land or team-land, terra carucae, carucata (ad arandum). It was the constant aim of the officers in charge of cadastre and taxation to ascertain not only how many actual ploughs were in use in the country, but how much land there was for tillage. This is by no means strange, as cadastral operations are generally meant to describe the agriculture of a country, not merely in its constantly changing matter-of-fact expression, but also in its potential aspects. It was not merely the stock in hand, but also the arable territory that had to be surveyed and estimated from this point of view. A tract of land which might lie waste to-day might come under cultivation to-morrow, nor was it the interest of the Crown to render uncultivated districts privileged in regard to taxation. However this may be, we hear distinctly in the case of the carucage of 2 Richard I that 100 acres of arable land had to be reckoned on every carucate in the sense of land which might be put under plough.¹ The 100 acres have in all probability to be taken in their strict sense in this case: it is hardly likely that the long-hundred system should have been used at this comparatively late date as a common reckoning unit for the whole of England. If this is so, the carucage of 1198 was actually attempting to reduce the area of the fiscal plough-land in comparison with its agrarian basis—the plough-land of 120 acres. Such attempts are not to be wondered at; they spring from the natural wish of statesmen introducing a new fiscal measure to make it yield as much as possible, and to stretch it further than the formerly accepted standard.

In the light of this parallel between the Angevin carucages and the Domesday computation of terrae carucarum, it seems obvious that the meaning of this latter was to provide the government with a survey of the arable land in England which might be used for the plough, apart from its actual cultivation. For this purpose, neither the enumeration of the ploughs nor that of hides and geld carucates could serve: not the first, because it applied to teams and not to lands; not the latter, because it was expressed in more or less artificial units which lacked uniformity and were not up to date. We cannot take our stand on this simple inference, however, as the matter has been made the subject of much controversy, and as our evidence happens on some occasions to be rather obscure.

The meaning of 'land fit for tillage' seems to be the most natural one in most of the cases presented by the Domesday Survey and kindred documents. In fact, we sometimes read the very words, 'land that can be ploughed by so many teams,'¹ or 'land for tillage, carucates for tillage,'² 'land where there could be x ploughs,'³ 'land for x ploughs' (terra ad x carucas).⁴ These expressions receive their simplest explanation from the same clue, and the latter leads up directly to the common notices terra carucae, terra carucarum, or terra carucis. Indeed, it would be difficult to attach too much importance to these equal terms. It requires strong proofs to the contrary to make us believe that people chose these four or five plain expressions in order to convey a meaning not directly implied by any of them. It cannot be denied that there is a certain foundation for a different construction suggested by the text of some other entries. By the side of the sentence 'x carucae possunt fieri' (or 'possent esse') appears another, which occurs indeed on fewer occasions, but yet often enough not to be treated as a mere exception or as a slip of the tongue; I mean the phrase 'x carucae plus possent esse'.¹ Here the contrast lies not between plough-teams and plough-lands, but between plough-teams in actual use and land which could be utilized by an increase in the number of the teams. And in some cases the Survey goes further, and speaks of a number of teams which could be restored in a district, instead of speaking of land for ploughs,² implying that at some former time there had actually been a greater number of plough-teams. On the other hand, we may hear of there being as much land for ploughs as there were teams (x carucae, Terra totidem carucis).³ In a few counties, for example in Leicestershire, the term terra a carucis alternates with that 'Ibi fuerunt T.R.E. a carucae', and by its side appears occasionally the addition of nunc or unde to the number of actual teams,⁴ a turn of phrase which again makes us think that the Survey contrasted teams T.R.W. with teams T.R.E. On the strength of such expressions it has been supposed that the entries as to terra carucarum or terra carucis apply usually to the number of teams used in Edward the Confessor's reign in distinction to the numbers of William the Conqueror's age. As the instructions to the commissioners preserved in the Ely Inquest actually require the different data of the Survey to be given for three periods, namely, for the time of King Edward, the moment when the Domesday possessor received the estate, and the date of the Survey, the terra carucarum entry seems almost necessary to fill the blank which would otherwise be left in regard to the T.R.E. status of the teams.

Are we then to take the clue for the terra carucarum entry from the reference to possible tillage and speak of team-lands, or from the comparison between T. R. E. and T. R. W., and speak only of the plough-teams in both cases? And how is one to solve the apparent contradiction between the two sets of passages if they are both admitted to have a real significance? It seems to me that it is quite out of the question to employ the T. R. E. number of the teams as a general clue for the terra carucis entries all through the Survey. In a very large number of cases the number of terrae carucis is a good deal larger than the number of teams (carucae), while the value of the estate T. R. E. turns out to be smaller—a most improbable contingency if terra carucis is taken to apply to the T. R. E. tillage.

A mere reference to teams does not explain the cases when the Survey expressly states that it has in view land sufficient for tillage.¹ Nor does it fit the cases when the terra carucis expression is turned into the equivalent carucatae or carucatae ad arandum.¹ It becomes evident in such instances that plough-lands are meant, and there is no escape from this affinity of the entries under discussion and those of geld carucates. It is impossible to evolve the latter out of the team, but it corresponds naturally to the plough-land, whether real and measured or estimated by approximation. But how is one to deal with the Leicester-shire and kindred entries?

Methods of
team-lands.

The way out of the difficulty does not seem hard to find after all, when one reflects that it is not only the general question in regard to land fit for tillage people had to consider in such a case, but also the means by which it could be solved. All investigators of Domesday have to recognize that there was a wide gulf between the formularies of questions addressed to commissioners and juries, and the actual returns made by them. The Ely formulary, for instance, is anything but a complete instruction followed unswervingly throughout the realm. A number of items crop up in the inquiry, to which there is not the slightest allusion in it: the bordarii and a number of other classes, for instance, are simply passed over in this document, although they form such an important item in the Survey itself. The estimates of surface and the enumeration of cattle forming such an important feature of the East Anglia inquiry do not correspond to anything in the Ely list of questions. On the other hand, the threefold notation enjoined by it is scarcely ever followed out in practice: the quando recepit numbers are given only exceptionally, and as for the contrast between T. R. E. and T. R. W., it is treated in a very different manner in divers localities. Altogether, even the slightest acquaintance with the Survey is sufficient to convince one that the cadastre was executed in a very different way in various counties, according to the lights of the local juries and of the commissioners.

From this general digression let us turn again to the concrete question underlying the terra carucis entries, namely, for how many ploughs was there land in a particular estate?¹ The subject is quite on a par with the approximative estimates of the quantity of land in a manor or under pasture, or in a wood, and in view of these last it would be strange indeed if the number of plough-lands or team-lands should not have been attended to. But neither of these questions was easy to answer, and in regard to the estimates of area or economic value of pastures and woods we are not astonished to find different methods employed in various districts. Sometimes a very rough estimate in square leagues and furlongs is given, sometimes the number of head of cattle which could feed on the territory, sometimes, again, the revenue it might bring in.² Anyhow, the juries did not approach this part of the inquiry in the same manner, and some actually omitted it altogether.

No wonder that something of the same kind happened in regard to the arable. In order to make an estimate of the potential capacity of the land for tillage, the jurors naturally turned in many places to the data of the Confessor's time, especially in cases where the amount of ploughed land had in the course of time become less. On other occasions the return as to plough-lands was made as a rough estimate very much at haphazard; it is actually said of a district in Cornwall that it was appreciated at 15 or 30 plough-lands, or from 15 to 30 as we should say nowadays.¹ But in most cases a more accurate valuation was attempted. It proceeded evidently on the assumption that 120 acres ought to go to the normal plough-land. As this is the average composition of the geld-hide the potential plough-land must have been thought to be of a similar size, but the very approximate character of the estimate is expressed, among other things, in the noteworthy fact that fractions are very seldom given, and when mentioned at all they are expressed only in the main subdivisions of a plough-land into oxgangs. Terra x boum, or x bobus occur sometimes, but acres do not appear, a fact which in itself speaks strongly against the theory that Terra carucis entries are references to Edwardian numbers. Of course, the computations as to arable when formulated in the shape of estimates in plough-lands may have been arrived at in different ways. It is not absolutely necessary that they should have been guesses made with the help of the naked eye, although many such guesses may have been transmitted to posterity, especially in provinces laid waste by war and pillage.² In other instances, on the contrary, the plough-land computation may have rested on the solid basis of actual tillage, presenting the sum of extant holdings by the side of the numbering of geld units. Anyhow, in the eyes of the government, the plough-land entries represented a general estimate of available arable land, on the standard of 120 acres to a plough, as the plough-team entries took stock of the beasts of burden actually employed in tillage on the standard of eight oxen to the plough. This being so, one might say that the plough-lands of Domesday are a medium term between the purely artificial geld units—the hides and carucates of the geld—and their real counterparts in the fields. In fact, the introduction of the carucate unit in the north of England may have taken the shape of a conversion of ideal plough-lands of the kind mentioned in Domesday into fiscal carucates, as it was not the real and actual plough-holding that was taken as taxable area, but a normal and average group of 120 acres. This is reflected in the gradual passage from terra carucis to carucatae ad arandum and from these to geld carucates.¹ A doubt has been expressed as to the possibility of finding room for the plough-lands mentioned in Domesday in the arable territory of England, but I do not think the actual figures warrant such a doubt, and, after all, it would not be easier to locate the long hides of 120 acres in some provinces, if the same strict rules were adopted in regard to them. The plough-land numbers fit better, as a matter of fact, because, being approximate, they allow of the inclusion of a good deal of uncultivated land within the area of estimation.

4. The best means of testing theories in regard to the meaning of the several Domesday expressions is to examine rather carefully their mutual correspondence in the Survey. It is clear that they are not likely to coincide in most cases, although there may be cases where the land taken up for tillage by teams of eight oxen amounted to the entire area available for such a purpose, and was taxed at a number of geld units exactly identical with the number of teams and imaginary plough-lands.² By the side of such cases of complete coincidence stand numberless instances where the assessment for the geld is heavier or lighter than the number of plough-lands or of teams would lead one to expect ;³

cases easily explained by some deficiency in the estate, or by some privilege, or, on the contrary, by some features of additional value. Then, again, on many occasions the number of teams is not sufficient to till the available plough-lands.¹ Such discrepancies are easy to explain, and, in fact, they are necessary consequences of the adopted principles. But there is one by no means unfrequent combination which seems puzzling, and requires some attention on the part of inquirers. I mean the cases where the number of teams is larger than that of the available plough-lands: the stock on the estates appears to be in excess of its needs, and one may say of the manors and townships described in such a way that they are 'overstocked'.² What lies at the root of such combinations, which, let it be noted, present the same difficulties to all the theories propounded by students of Domesday? Several explanations may be attempted, and they may all be justified to a certain extent. To begin with, we must reckon with the possibility of some of the teams mentioned being in truth batches of eight oxen, each employed not for tillage, but for carrying loads or any other purpose, or even collected for sale, or kept as a reserve for eventual needs. Then, again, the plough-lands mentioned may have been dispersed among a great many holders striving to keep their separate teams, in which case the quantity of stock employed on the estates would of course come to exceed the purely economic requirements of the situation.¹ One more possibility seems worthy of consideration, namely, the existence of forms of cultivation more complicated and intensive than the usual methods of tillage, and therefore requiring a larger stock. The 120 acres usually assigned to a team of eight small oxen yoked to a clumsy plough might turn out to be inadequate, even in the case of a three-field system, with some manuring and a two-fold tillage for winter seed and a breaking up of the fallow, not to speak of more complex systems.

However this may be, it is almost impossible for us to trace the exact course of such an influence. There is nothing to show that the contrast between a two-field and a three-field system was reflected in the ratio between geld units and plough-lands. Indeed, the imposition of geld units was determined by considerations which had nothing to do with the open-field shift of townships. It would have been preposterous to inflict on three-field townships a heavier burden because they were cultivated rather better than the two-field ones, nor is there the slightest support for a construction of the carucate as the quantity of arable cultivated at one time in one year. But it deserves notice that there is a series of interesting entries in Yorkshire which show that the relation of the geld carucates to the plough-lands, to the terra carucis, was not made out for each single case separately. Canon

Taylor has¹ collected data to show that this relation may be almost always reduced to one of two simple ratios: the number of carucates is either exactly equal to or exactly double that of land used for ploughs. Even putting on one side incorrect assumptions about the carucate as plough-land and the terra carucis as plough-teams, or the theory about the two- and three-field shift in use at that time in the Yorkshire manors, we cannot disregard the remarkable neatness of the ratio between carucates and land for ploughs, and the striking opposition between the two ratios amounting to a duplication of the fiscal burden. A closer examination shows that this neatness has been somewhat exaggerated, and that we have rather to start from the fact that in a great many cases the land for ploughs is a good deal less than the number of geldable carucates, and that in most of these cases it amounted to one-half of the latter. These proportions are exemplified by the comparison of townships on the heavy clay soil of Holderness, where the two terms are equal, with those on the lighter soil of the Wolds, where we encounter the double ratio. If we reject Canon Taylor's hypothesis as involving us in difficulties on all sides,² the most plausible explanation seems to be that the juries, in their approximate estimation of the capacity of the district for cultivation, wanted to impress on the government the view that certain parts of it were incapable of bearing the burden of taxation which lay on them from the preceding age. Yorkshire was an especially devastated county, and the inquiry of the Domesday commissioners was in many respects directed towards different aims from that of neighbouring territories. The notice terra ad x carucas occurs in a great many cases without any reference to actual cultivation, to the carucae or teams.³ The values affixed in the margin are very small, and refer to an undetermined time. Even on the occasions when we get regular surveys of manors, similar to those of other counties, traces of waste are apparent everywhere. The alleviation of fiscal burdens was not as yet carried out. The geldable units are everywhere marked in full as of old, and the returns were seemingly designed to prepare the way for reductions by stating roughly where the imposition was warranted by the state of things, and where it ought to be largely reduced. The juries did not say so in as many words, but they hinted at the necessity by reducing the number of supposed plough-lands.¹ This was not in keeping with the use of the plough-land term in other parts of the country, but it was an effective way of stating the case, and likely to attain the purpose in view.

5. The survey of Middlesex and a few entries in other counties disclose another important aspect of these investigations as to units of assessment and tillage. The three usual statements referring to geld-hides, plough-lands, and plough-teams occur there, as everywhere else, but there is one interesting supplementary feature, namely, the enumeration of the holdings of the tenants estimated in fractions of the hide—in half-hides, virgates, and acres. It is clear at once that these fractions were intended to be subdivisions of the hides at which the manors are rated for the geld.² But the numbers do not always correspond: in some cases the holdings exceed or fall short in their aggregate in comparison with the number of plough-lands and of geld units.³ This being so, we have to take the estimate of the tenants' land to refer not only to artificial units, but to the field holdings, the hides, virgates, and acres of agrarian occupation. This means, of course, that the soil of the manors comprised a certain number of units called hides, virgates, acres, which did not coincide with the fiscal units imposed on it. A geld-hide may have corresponded to one hide and a half or two hides distributed among the rustics. While in most cases this agricultural basis remains concealed in the Survey, it is clearly set before us in the Middlesex survey. The description of Sawbridge-worth, in Hertfordshire,¹ and some data in the Cambridge-shire inquest, contain also direct references to holdings estimated in fractions of hides.² Of later surveys, the Burton cartulary follows exactly the same lines, and supplements its statements as to the number of fiscal units by particulars referring to the units of actual agrarian occupation.³ As the Middlesex instances present the fullest data about the relative value of the different Domesday notes on the cadastre, I may be allowed to examine them at some length. In doing so I will designate the entries as to geldable units as term I, those referring to land fit for tillage as term II, the numbers of teams as term III, and the details as to holdings as term IV. The results, as far as they can be clearly ascertained, are tabulated in an appendix. In the first table the number of geld-hides imposed on the estates is compared with the aggregate sums of hides and virgates distributed among the demesne and the tenantry. In nineteen cases out of seventy-six the sum of geld-hides corresponds, or nearly so, to the sum of actual holdings: the sum total of the hides enumerated in these instances of correspondence is (a) geld-hides against (b) field-hides in demesne and tenants' holdings. In four cases only term I turns out to be considerably less than term II. In fifty-three cases the sum of geld units is considerably larger than that of hides in actual holdings. In Harrow (Herges), for instance,¹ 100 hides are reckoned for the geld, while the domain and tenants' holdings comprise only $60\frac{1}{2}$ hides and 13 acres. In Harmondsworth (Hermodesworth)² there are 30 hides to the geld, and only 18 hides and 2 virgates in actual possession. In Bedfont³ 3 hides, 2 virgates, and 13 acres are distributed among the holders, although ten hides are charged to the geld. The inference from these figures seems to be that the county was, as a rule, assessed in a much heavier manner than the occupation of the soil at the time of Domesday would have warranted. The value of the estates shows generally a decrease for the time of the Survey in comparison with King Edward's reign, but this decrease is not very great. It is noteworthy, however, that there is a very marked falling-off between the T.R.E. notation and the moment when the manor was taken up by its Norman holder. These data are significant, especially as they are gathered from a good many entries. They indicate that the original distribution of units between the estates, effected in round numbers, contemplated a state of greater prosperity in the country. The Norman Conquest produced, as an immediate result, a very sharp fall of values and an actual diminution of population and of agrarian occupation, expressed in the very low figures of the 'valet' clause in regard to the time when the estates were distributed among Norman lords, that is, mostly soon after 1066. In 1086 the number of holdings was still very inferior to that of former days, but the income of the lords had risen almost to its former level, presumably in consequence of the imposition of much heavier duties.

Against 24½ hides of the latter stand 15 hides in demesne, half a hide of the reeve, 1 hide of the priest, 2½ of free tenants, 7 hides 3½ virgates belonging to villains, 1 hide 3½ virgates to bordarii, 1½ virgate presumably to socmen (predicti villani in the text seems to point to the four socmen mentioned in the beginning and below). Besides these were 413 acres distributed among various smaller holdings. The virgate is certainly reckoned at 30 acres, as is shown by the rent of the socmen—17s. 4d. for 1½ virgate and 9 acres, exactly 2d. per acre. The whole comes to about 28 hides instead of 24, and the balance is not restored even if we subtract the 2½ hides held by the free tenants.

Ploughlands in Middlesex.

Turning to Table II, we get the relation between the actual holdings of 1086 and the presumed plough-lands. We find only one instance where both numbers are in complete agreement—Hampton,¹ a manor of St. Peter of Westminster, in which the 16 plough-lands correspond exactly to 10 hides in domain and 6 hides held by the tenants. It is curious that this equilibrium is supported, notwithstanding the fact that out of the 16 plough-lands only 11 are provided with full teams, and there could be five more teams on the land of the peasants. There is a falling-off in value from 12*l.* T.R.E. to 8*l.* T.R.W., with a corresponding diminution in the number of actual hides against the geld-hides of ancient assessment (16 against 20). The inference seems to be that in this case the decrease in the area of cultivation was counter-balanced by an increase in the exploitation of the remaining impoverished tenants. Although Hampton is the only case of exact correspondence, there are about eighteen other instances out of sixty-nine, where the numbers, though not identical, show a very great similitude between II and IV. In the case of Kensington,² the 10 hides of assessment correspond exactly to the 10 plough-lands, and the manor must have comprised some 1,200 acres of arable. There were 4 ploughs in domain and 5 teams belonging to the villains, with the deficiency of only 1 plough. The value had sunk for a time, but it had been brought up again T.R.W. to the same height as T.R.E., namely, to 10*l.* At first glance this seems to disagree entirely with the startling fact that only 3 hides and 3½ virgates are distributed among the villains, and no hides are charged to the domain. But as there are 4 teams actually at work in the lord's land, the disagreement comes out to be only an apparent one, and in reality the instance is one of nearly complete equilibrium. In most cases, however, the numbers of possible plough-lands and of actual occupation vary greatly, and, what is even more remarkable, the variations arrange themselves on both sides of the balance. In about an equal number of cases there are considerably more plough-lands than actual agricultural hides, and, on the other hand, more hides of actual occupation than plough-lands. On the one side we get, for example, as extreme instances, such entries as Isleworth (Gistelsworde), with 55 plough-lands and only 31 hides, $1\frac{1}{2}$ virgates, among tenants and domain; Staines, with 24 plough-lands and 18 hides in actual occupation; while on the other are to be found, e. g., Northalt, with 15 hides of actual occupation as against 10 plough-lands; Fulham, with 49 field-hides and land for 40 ploughs. If we examine these selected instances a little closer, we find that Isleworth¹ had about 6,600 acres of arable land on the computation of 120 acres to the plough, but instead of 55 ploughs to till them it possessed only 34. These were in the possession of the demesne (6), some knights holding 4 hides, and of more than 100 peasant householders, with 24 hides $3\frac{1}{2}$ virgates between them. Notwithstanding the insufficiency in the number of ploughs, of which there could be 11 more, the value had decreased only from 80*l.* T.R.E. to 70*l.* T.R.W. The existing teams and holdings were evidently able to perform the necessary work, and to render dues wellnigh to the same extent as in the age of Edward the Confessor, but the manor was considerably below the level of its original assessment. Staines,² a manor of Westminster, was rated only at 19 hides, evidently on a very privileged scale. It contained land for 24 ploughs, that is, approximately, 2,880 acres of arable. As a matter of fact, there were 24 teams to plough the land, of which 13 belonged to the domain and 11 to the peasants. 11 hides were charged to the domain and nearly 8 hides to villains; these last were subdivided in a number of holdings, the bordarii being especially numerous. The value had gone down from 40*l.* to 35*l.* The aggregate of the holdings is thus considerably less than the number of ploughlands and of teams (19 against 24), while the numbers of the geld hidage and of the holdings coincide. There is, however, a clear indication as to the manner in which the balance was restored in this case. Staines was not merely an agricultural settlement, but also a considerable town, containing forty-six burgesses. Although the rent paid by them was not large—40*s.*, the existence of the urban settlement is sufficient to explain the smaller number of hides in the rural holdings. Kingsbury¹ (Chingesberie), the manor of Ernulf de Hesding, shows a decrease in value from 6*l.* to 4*l.*, and has only 2 teams in demesne and some 3 hides belonging to the villains on a territory of 7 plough-lands (840 acres); two field-hides are wanted to make up the full complement of holdings. It is not impossible that the five plough-teams undertook all the labour necessary for the tillage of the 7 plough-lands, thus reaching an average of about 148 acres per team, but it is more likely that part of the arable remained without cultivation: hence the diminution in value.

Consuetu-
dines Villae.

Let us now look at the instances where the number of hides in the holdings turns out to be larger than that of available plough-lands. Northalt² possessed land for 10 ploughs, and yet it was charged to the geld at 15 hides, and there were 15 hides distributed among its various holdings, 8 being in demesne and 7 in the hands of the peasants. As for teams, there were only 2 on the domain and 6 on the land of the villains; there could be two more on this last portion. The value of the estate had gone down from 12*l.* to 10*l.*, and this seems quite natural in view of the decrease in the number of teams. But how is the large number of field- and geld-hides to be accounted for? As the field holdings were in this case in exact correspondence with the geld-hides, we have to assume that the distribution of land among the population of the manor was based on a subdivision of the fiscal shares and not of plough-lands. The average of the field-hide would thus fall short of the 120 acres in regard to arable, and even more in regard to the land actually cultivated by the teams. There would not be more than 80 acres per hide in the arable, and not more than 64 acres under actual cultivation by teams. These averages would be deceptive in their roughness, however, because the strongest contrast is to be found in the case of domanial land where 8 hides correspond to 2 teams only, while on the land of the peasants the proportion is 7 to 6. This observation brings us to an inference of great importance. The hides charged to the domain cannot be considered in the same light as those enumerated in the land of the rustics. These last are evidently taken as real holdings, and stand therefore in a close relation to the plough-lands and plough-teams, whereas the domanial part is charged with hides to express its share in the burdens of the estates. Its hides are therefore in many instances, if not in all, the result of artificial computation; they stand in a closer correspondence with the fiscal numbers, and, on the contrary, swerve very greatly from the number of teams assigned to them. One circumstance comes out very forcibly in regard to this portion. While the holding of the peasant and the work performed in it determine the economic value of the peasant's land and its share in taxation, the economic and fiscal significance of the domain depends on two factors—on the work of the teams and labourers of the home farm and on that of the tenants, the adiutorium villae, the consuetudines villae. The importance of this consideration will be made even clearer later on, when we come to consider the two portions in their separate relations to the system of holdings.

Let us now take the bishop of London's manor of Fulham.¹ It is rated at 40 hides, and contains land for 40 ploughs (4,800 acres). There are 4 teams in demesne and 26 peasants' teams, and there could be 10 more. The value has decreased from 50*l.* to 40*l.*, and the domanial description again gives only a small number of separate ploughs (4, and 4 might be added), leaving us to infer that a good deal of the work was performed by the peasants. In actual distribution there are 13 hides charged to the domain, 14 held by peasants, and 23 of peasant land ceded to French soldiers and burgesses—altogether 50 hides. It is quite clear in this case that the distributed holdings do not fit either into the aggregate of geld units or into the numbers of ploughlands, at least according to the normal reckoning of 120 acres to the hide. We have to infer that the shares in the field were smaller—about 100 acres to the hide if we include the demesne hides, some 112 acres if we reckon only 4 plough-holdings for the domain. Another explanation of the larger number of holdings might be that some of them were of a lesser size; for instance, those occupied by burgesses, while the rest roughly corresponded in shape to the normal standard. This second explanation is, of course, particularly adapted to some of these Middlesex places in their immediate vicinity to London, but it is hardly sufficient by itself to meet the numerous instances of congestion of holdings recorded in our second table.

Demesne
teams and hides.

Table III treats of the teams on the domain in relation to the hides in domain. It may serve to illustrate further the notion exposed in connexion with the Northalt case. There are only two instances where the number of teams exceeds that of the hides assigned to the domain, and only four where both numbers are equal, while in thirty-two cases, where both domain hides and teams are recorded, the latter are more or less in excess of the first. In some instances the excess is very great. In Harrow, e. g., only 4 ploughs are mentioned on the domain, while 30 hides are put to its reckoning; in Haminton¹ of Walter de S. Waleric there are 3 teams to 18 hides. In the second case the whole manor was rated at 35 hides, and there was land for 25 ploughs, that is, 3,000 acres on the 120 acres standard. The villains held 17 teams in holdings amounting to $10\frac{1}{2}$ hides, and there could have been 5 teams more on the peasants' land. It is clear that most of the work on the lord's land was performed by the peasants' ploughs; in fact, that the rustic part of the manor ought to have occupied fully 2,640 acres out of the 3,000, although the hidage of the domain was over one-half of the whole geld hidage of the manor, and almost twice as much as the aggregate of actual villain holdings. The almost constant predominance of hides over teams is, in fact, quite characteristic for the domain, which drew its income and labour largely, not from its own resources, but from those of the dependent population.

Table V, illustrating the relation between plough-teams and peasant holdings, is more complex in its character. In two cases the numbers are equal, and in about ten cases nearly equal, but there are eleven cases where there is more land in the holdings than teams, and not less than twenty where, on the contrary, there are more teams than holdings. The group of cases in which the aggregate of holdings is too large for the number of teams is easy to explain by an insufficiency of stock on the holdings, and on the whole the discrepancies in this respect are not very striking, the most glaring instance being presented by the already quoted description of Fulham, with its peasant 36 hides against 26 teams. This and kindred instances are easily accounted for by a diminution of stock and a corresponding decrease in value.

But we hear much more often of manors in which there were a good many more teams than would have been necessary for the holdings. Let us take Edmonton¹ (Adelmetone), a manor of Geoffrey de Mandeville. There was land for 26 ploughs (3,120 acres), and there were exactly 4 teams in demesne and 22 belonging to the peasants, so that every acre of available land had been utilized. The domain was charged with fully 16 hides, and the villains held among them twelve hides and a half. It is impossible to suppose that there were 1,920 acres in the domain portion and 1,500 in the peasant portion, because this would bring up the total to 3,420 acres of arable, instead of 3,120. The discrepancy between the 22 teams assigned to the peasants and the $12\frac{1}{2}$ hides held by them is even greater. There does not seem to be any way out of these difficulties but the supposition that the peasant holdings in this case were cut larger than usual, so that some of the hides practically contained 2 teams each or not much less, in fact the peasant portion was clearly overstocked. On the other hand, the hides in demesne evidently comprised not only plough-lands, but also a certain number of ideal shares meant to express the additional work performed by the auxiliary ploughs of the township. The slight discrepancy in the aggregate, amounting, if expressed in terms of plough-land quantity, to about 300 acres, or a total of 3,120, may have been produced by the loss of time and energy consequent on the transmission of peasant work to domanial land. Similar instances are presented by the surveys of Stibenhead, Tottenham, &c.

FISCAL IMMUNITIES

1. HITHERTO we have treated of taxation and fiscal estimates as if they were always directed to ascertain what fair share of the revenue from a particular estate had to be levied for the needs of the commonwealth. But the fiscal burden was not always divided fairly and equally between the different members of the community; there were many cases and grounds of privilege and exemption. Besides these variations from the standard, we have to reckon with other reductions produced by the gradual or sudden changes in the economic condition of certain districts and properties; impositions, which were quite fair and reasonable at one time, got to be too heavy at a later time, on account of some disturbing influence: the assessment had to be revised and reduced or increased accordingly.¹ All these features and processes have left traces in the Survey, and we have to mention shortly how these modifications of normal returns were effected and recorded.

Beneficial
hidation.

So-called beneficial hidation is often to be noticed on the strength of internal evidence, the geld unit assigned to a place being evidently too insignificant in view of other facts enrolled. Medeveld² in Staffordshire may be taken as a very moderate instance of privileged or beneficial hidation.

It is rated with its belongings at one hide, and yet there is land for 12 ploughs in it, and there are actually four teams on that land—one in domain and three in the hands of the tenants. Evidently it had been taxed much too lightly, and one may suspect that this was done on account of the influence exerted by its owners—at the time of Edward the Confessor, at any rate, it was owned by Algar, a great thane. There are many glaring instances of such beneficial hidation on the estates of great men¹ and of the Church.²

Sometimes we are told expressly that a reduction of the burden has taken place. Bastedene, Berks, e. g., was charged to the geld for 20 hides T.R.E., and only for 6 hides T.R.W. In Henret, Berks, the hidage of one portion of the township which had belonged to Alwin had been reduced from 5 hides to 2 hides, while another portion formerly held by seven freemen for 5 hides was taxed T.R.W. at only 30 acres. In the case of Stanford, in the same county, there had been two reductions. It used to pay geld for 40 hides; King Edward had reduced the assessment to 30 hides, and at the time of the Survey it was charged only for 6 hides, although there were 12 actual teams on the land, 3 belonging to the domain and 9 to peasants.³ A curious case is presented by a manor called Five-hide, in the fief of Henry de Ferrers in Berkshire. One would have thought that its very name pointed to an estimate at 5 hides. Yet we hear that the assessment used to be 10 hides, and it was brought over to 5 only in the reign of King Edward. There was land for 6 ploughs in the place, which is nearer to 5 hides than to 10. Judging from this and from the name, it may be supposed that the 10 hides assessment was not the original one, but rather an attempt to increase the burden of the estate, and that it was restored to its former valuation in the age of King Edward the Confessor.⁴

It is to be noticed in passing that the reduction of hidage was by no means always a sign of deterioration of the estate. An instance like the following would by no means be an isolated one. The Archbishop of Canterbury's manor of Aldintone in Kent was taxed at 21 sulungs in the time of King Edward, and at 15 in the reign of William the Conqueror. It was an enormous estate, with land for 100 ploughs and 190 villains' holdings, besides the cottages of 50 bordarii on the land. Its value had, as a matter of fact, increased from 62*l.* T.R.E. to 100*l.*, 20*s.* T.R.W. It seems clear that the reduction of 6 sulungs on a tax of 21 is to be attributed to the pressure brought to bear on the Exchequer by the owner, and not to a fall in value.¹ There are also instances where a change in the taxation of an estate is produced merely because some part of it had got into the hands of a new owner.²

But, of course, in many cases the reduction was called for by the devastation of the province, or some mishap which had befallen a particular estate. A most characteristic entry in the Hampshire Survey tells us of the lightening of the fiscal burden of Farnham from 30 to 20 hides by King Edward on account of the ravages of the Vikings.³ It has been shown that sweeping reductions were made in Northamptonshire and Staffordshire in consequence of the devastation produced by the war of the Conquest.⁴

bered hides and fiscal hides. This distinction occurs both in the description of Farnham just quoted and in that of the Bishop of Winchester's manor of Waltham.¹ Thus by the side of hides paying geld or entered as fiscal units there were hides which had nothing to do with geld, but were real enough nevertheless.² The Survey often insists on the difference between these two kinds, and implies clearly enough that the fiscal valuation was not the basis of the distribution into hides, but superadded to it. The hides continue to exist even when they do not appear as fiscal units. A manor or a district is said to be defending itself for so many hides, while the actual number of hides in it may be quite different.³ There is an intricate entry in the Survey of the possessions of Abingdon in Berkshire. Beedon defended itself T.R.E. for 10 hides, and T.R.W. for 8 hides only. In reality there were 15 hides, and King Edward had conceded to the owner to hold it for 11 hides. The further reduction to 10 hides is challenged by this verdict of the jurors as illegal.⁴

The most striking example of the contrast between fiscal hides and numbered hides is presented by the description of Cornwall. It contains a series of double entries about hidage, the hides of assessment being distinguished from hides paying geld T.R.E. Pawton¹ is a good example. It paid geld for 8 hides, but there were 44 hides there. There was land for 60 ploughs, and actually 43 ploughs on the land, between demesne and tenants' land. In the geld inquisition of the county in 1084 the same information is imparted on the strength of evidence given by the English jurors.² In this and similar cases there can be no talk of a liberation of domanial hides—this comes under another rubric. The point is that of roughly 400 hides in Cornwall only about 128 paid geld. What were the rest reckoned for? It seems clear that, as in the case of the East Anglian shires, the ordinary hides must have served for the assessment of other duties—fyrd, churchscot, suit of court, &c.³

Sometimes we can actually get a glimpse of the process by which single hides or estates obtain exemptions from geld. The whole county of Gloucester testifies that out of 15 hides which used to pay geld in Siward's manor of Lecelade, 6 were exempted by the king himself.⁴ In Hampshire, Alwi the thane is able to produce a writ under seal of King Edward in respect to a yardland which had been freed and exempted.⁵ In Lancashire, 3 hides are mentioned expressly as free, because their geld had been conceded by the king to the thanes that held them.⁶ Nor can there be any doubt that other cases in the same district, where the tenants are free from the geld, go back to such royal grants.¹ Altogether, there are many instances in which the origin of the exemption, though not expressly stated, is hardly traceable to any other cause.²

An important group of exemptions is formed by certain lands, to which immunity from geld had been granted because they belonged to churches. Of course, not all the ecclesiastical estates were free from geld—every page of Domesday speaks to the contrary, but a good deal of land was exempted even from the geld in order that it might serve exclusively for the needs of religion and of the clerical profession. These special exemptions are often entered in the Survey.³ We even hear of ‘all geld and foreign service’ being conceded to a church.⁴ A most interesting feature of such concessions is that they were supposed to place ecclesiastical estates in the same position as those of the king himself. Nor is there a lack of information to the effect that royal manors were in principle held to be exempted from the payment of geld because they were subjected to the king’s farm,⁵ that is, included in the domain of the sovereign, ministering to his private needs, and first of all providing food for his household. There are cases where whole hundreds were of old exempted from the geld, and these sweeping privileges can hardly be accounted for by any other consideration but that the hundred dues went into the private treasury of the king, or of some person of his family.¹ Later on we find similar exemptions extended to churches, and the analogy of these cases with that of royal domains is expressly insisted upon.²

Thus we are led to consider a number of instances where land was not subject to geld, and was yet divided and estimated in the same way as other land paying geld. Hides not liable to geld are to be met with at every step, and their immunity is often asserted as a privilege conferred on them from the very beginning.³ This means that the original grant constituting the estate liberated it from all dues to the king, including geld, or was construed to do so. It is important to find the many traces of such complete exemption in Domesday, as they enable us to connect the Domesday system of taxation with previous periods. If anything, we should expect such immunity to be even more frequent.

and hundreds surveyed in hides but not charged to the geld, we find two groups of data disclosing interesting principles of the Old English system of taxation as received by Domesday. Firstly, it appears that royal manors liable to the king's farm were sometimes not estimated in hides, or not divided into hides,¹ as the Survey expresses it. This expression is noteworthy—it may be taken as one of the many indications of the fundamental fact that hides were not ideal shares only, but real entities, a fact from which many consequences resulted, as we shall soon see. Evidently the methods of collecting the farm were, in some cases at least, of such a kind that a subdivision into hide shares was deemed unnecessary. Another case when hides were not formed was, of course, that of newly reclaimed or occupied districts.² The geld carucate ought to stand in regard to these eventualities on a par with the hide, but the Survey mostly speaks of hidage only, evidently drawing a distinction between the ancient repartition into hides and the more modern measurement of land in carucates.

Indeed, and this is the second interesting feature of the system of exemptions, it is quite common to find that agrarian shares freed from the payment of geld are termed carucates, and opposed, as such, to the hides. These would be field-carucates, carucatae ad arandum, and they are currently described as being outside the hides or besides the hides—extra hidas, praeter hidas.³ In this sense the carucate has to defend or acquit all the taxes imposed by the state. Hence its name, as wara corresponds literally to defensio, and the defence meant is undoubtedly the acquittal of all dues to be levied from a district or manor.¹ These are the fundamental lines of the distinction often employed in Domesday, and recurring in other documents in regard to the terms inland and warland. The corresponding ware, acreware, &c., are easily explained² once this fundamental contrast between exempted domain and land acquitting the dues is grasped. Nor must we let this guiding thread slip from our hands when we discover that these terms, and especially inland, are sometimes used in a somewhat different and derived sense. Inland occurs very often in the Danelaw, especially in Lincolnshire, and there it is taken mostly as the equivalent of domain whether exempted or not,³ or even of a township in which there is land cultivated for the lord—a manor with a hall, or a berwick.¹ The opposite is soca—land held by free tenants under the jurisdictional patronage of the lord.² On the other hand, in other counties, like Oxfordshire and Northamptonshire, we find sometimes a distinction made between domain and inland, only the exempted domain being reckoned as the latter.³ This may be partly explained by the fact that, in some cases, plots which had been originally warland may have been taken in the lord's hand, so that by the side of the originally exempted old domain there grew up another category of domain soil which could not claim the nature and privileges of inland. Altogether, there can be no doubt that a large portion of the domain lands did pay geld—whether by compulsion, or in consequence of agreement with the tenantry, it would be impossible to say. This circumstance made it quite reasonable that there should be attempts to draw a distinction between domain and inland. In the way of derived meanings, it may be worth while to notice that both inland and wara are used as names of places.⁴ It is certainly not strange that the terms mentioned should have gone through a kind of organic growth, and developed offshoots which did not coincide in their ramifications with the direction of the main branches. But there can be no misunderstanding in regard to the fundamental terminological distinction, and this is the really important point.

Thus we have to reckon in the Domesday Survey with the idea that the domain land of the military and clerical class should be free from geld. Two documents preceding the Survey by a few years bear out this view in a much more complete manner than the Domesday Survey itself. I mean the Geld Inquest of the south-western counties of 1084, and the Survey of Northamptonshire previous to 1075. Both are returns in regard to the collection of geld, and both group their data according to hundreds. The south-western Inquest tells us how much money was actually collected; who among the owners or tenants of estates had failed to pay, and who could claim exemption.¹ The Northamptonshire document mentions the composition of the hundred in hides, and points to exemptions and to failure of payment without giving the sums actually levied.² These are trifling differences after all, and the general arrangement of these documents, separated by an interval of some ten years, is remarkably alike. They are probably fragments of much more comprehensive returns relating to the execution of fiscal measures. The king's land does not pay,³ but, besides, a large proportion of the hides belonging to each hundred is set apart in both cases ; they are exempted as belonging to the domain of the barons.¹ On closer examination it turns out that these liberated lands do not coincide with the carucates put outside the hides in the Survey ; these latter appear by themselves in the south-western Inquest, but form only a small fraction of the total of exempted lands. In the Northamptonshire return it is quite common to find that 40 hides out of a hundred are liberated as 'inland', and as besides those there is a very large quantity of waste, and the royal manors have also to be taken off, what remains as geldable is generally much less than half the hundred. This is hardly to be explained by the devastated condition of the county. The waste hides are noticed separately, as has been said, and the south-western exemptions, though not so sweeping, still present a most striking diminution of the fiscal burden. One inference only remains open to us, namely, that these documents, both previous to the Domesday Survey, accept and follow out consistently the principle that two shares ought to be made of the land on which the fabric of the commonwealth of those times was resting—one share being geldable to the king, and the other ministering to the wants of soldiers and priests who were serving state and society in their respective callings. It is noteworthy, however, that, to judge by the south-western Inquest, which gives particulars, the demesne lands of the military and clerical classes were not considered as eo ipso exempted. Some of them are and some not, and we cannot perceive now why some were admitted to take advantage of immunity while others were not. Whether a special list was drawn up for each occasion—which is quite unlikely—or whether certain customs had formed themselves in this respect and what these customs were, we cannot say. We can just notice that the churches seem to have been more favoured than the lay fiefs, at any rate in the south-west. The uncertain character of the exemption is well in keeping with the fact that it is not mentioned in the Domesday Survey. This last is a general cadastre in which all the estates stand, or ought to stand, according to their estimated value. And it is the more noteworthy that the extra-hidal carucates and the non-hidated manors are duly entered in Domesday book. This shows that the ground for exemption was a special and a more absolute one; evidently also the more ancient, as it breaks not only through fiscal liabilities, but even through the usual terminology and metrology of the Survey. Its origin has to be sought in the division of the land into farm-rendering and geld-paying areas, not in the contrast between the geldable and the demesne land of lay and ecclesiastical barons. The first is certainly an Old English institution, the latter is clearly feudal, although it may have its roots in Old English history. In order to understand its bearing we must recall to memory the later separation of the geldable from franc fiefs. The Crown made great efforts to restrict immunities and to introduce extraordinary taxes obligatory for all classes, but it did not succeed in getting rid of the principle of the immunities, nor of their practical application. On the other hand, the claim allowed by King Henry I's charter that all knights defending their fiefs by the hauberk should not pay geld for them was never carried out in full. Still, it is characteristic of the principle underlying the claims for exemption on the part of people who did enjoy the privilege. The limitation embodied in the Inquests of 1075 and 1084 is to the effect that immunity should be granted, not to all knights, but to the barons; and the details as to exemptions show that this view was, to a great extent, carried out in practice, although not all baronial land was granted the privilege, and, on the other hand, some people of lower standing shared in it.¹

exemptions.

The history of the terms 'wara', 'warland', and 'inland' allows us some insight into the earlier evolution of a system of taxation based on a distinction between the ruling military class and the taxed labouring class. Most of our information comes from ecclesiastical documents, and some of them are by no means above suspicion, but the continuity of terminology and institutional development cannot be doubted, and from the point of view of the present inquiry it is not the fact that this or the other instrument is genuine or forged that is really important; a product of a forger when well in keeping with the legal requirements of the age is quite as valuable as a genuine charter. It is clear from a series of charters that the churches claimed and enjoyed immunity from all taxation and service for some of their estates. The reason assigned is the necessity of providing for prayers and ecclesiastical functions. The franchise does not consist merely of a liberation from dues to the king, but in the assignment of dues and profits, which might have accrued to the king, to the use of the churches themselves. As a consequence, regalities of tax and service passed into private hands, and were converted into claims of private rents and labour services.¹ At the same time it was not asserted that the church, as such, was free from taxes, or that particular sees and monasteries were exempted from them in regard to all their possessions. A division was made between land subjected to the taxation of the government and land enfranchised from it; the first had to bear the burden of dues for the latter.¹ This was the defence of the land, and 'defended land' appears as a standing expression² in Old English charters in the same way as defence as to geld is a standing term in the Domesday Survey. Inasmuch as defended, gewered, land must be under proper cultivation, gesett, colonized, cultivated, appears as the corollary of gewered. The opposition between inland as demesne and sett and gewered land may be traced before the Conquest.³ As a variation of it appear the expressions of inwaru and utwaru, the defence of an estate as against its owner being contrasted with its defence in respect of the king.¹ The Low Latin expression corresponding to utwaru would be servicium forinsecum, but whereas this latter in process of time began to be applied mainly to feudal military obligations, the utwaru of earlier times evidently comprised all services due to the king in distinction from what had to be performed for the landlord.

The twofold division of land into inland and warland is reflected, among other things, in the Geld Inquest by frequent reports about peasants who were remiss in paying their contributions to the tax.² The inference is that the failing dues were imposed directly on the warland of the estates. It is easy to see that the construction of landed property connected with such a system of taxation faced two ways. In a sense, the land owned by the barons and by the tenants was separated into two portions, the inland being distinct from the warland. In another sense they were closely united because the warland defended the inland as regarded taxes, and, as a matter of fact, supported its husbandry by the payment of rents and the performance of services. Historically, two origins are to be assigned to such a double-faced system; there is, firstly, the liberation of home farm or of central estates from services which were formerly incumbent on them along with other portions of the same estate; and there is, secondly, the combination into onewhole of originally distinct settlements—of seignorial estates with plots belonging to small statesmen, as they said in the north, small freemen charged with public duties. It may be that the well-known enactments of Ine's laws, about the responsibility of royal gesithcundmen as to the settlement and cultivation of districts, apply to this second process of social growth.¹ The lord, a royal follower or thane, gets a district of ten hides; he is responsible for at least six hides of it being defended in a proper manner, that is, provided with settlers paying taxes; the four remaining hides would be his inland, and cultivated for his farm. Of 20 hides, 12 ought to be warland; of three, one and a half. In certain charters we catch glimpses of the colonizing activity of lords who had obtained grants of hidated estates, and the result of such activity was quite as much to provide the State with gewcred hides as to ensure the prosperity of the lord's farm.² However this might be, the deep-going social influence of a system arranging public obligations, according to the principle that one class has to pay and another class to fight and to pray, can hardly be exaggerated. And when we have once thoroughly realized this fundamental distinction we shall be in a position to understand and to appreciate fully a point which has hardly been taken at its full value in the existing works on Anglo-Saxon institutions, namely, the usual exemption of bookland from all service to the king, with the exception of the Trinoda necessitas. This exemption surely means that no taxes were to be levied from owners of bookland, and the franchise clause is repeated over and over again in the numberless grants creating bookland property. Now, what was the aim and the extent of such emancipation? It was certainly intended to free the owners from all ordinary rents, taxes, provender dues, the quartering of soldiers and messengers, &c., and this is sometimes expressed in so many words,³ while in other cases a general reference is all that is given in the charters. The population settled in the districts comprised in the bookland franchise had henceforth to serve the grantee instead of paying and performing services to the king; it passed from a status of subjection to a public power into that of subjection to a private lord, although the sharpness of the contrast and the consequences it involved may not have been clearly realized at the outset. On the other hand, it is evident that these bookland franchises did not involve by themselves an immunity from extraordinary taxation, of which the Danegeld was the chief expression. The bookland grants are too numerous, they pervade too much the whole region of landownership, to allow of an exemption of bookland owners from such extraordinary impositions. These latter would have defeated themselves if they had put up with such exceptions. But, although bookland and inland are not identical, they proceed from the same principle—from the wish to place the fighting and praying portions of the community in a privileged position. The fiscal immunities from geld come as a second instalment of a policy already embodied in the freedom of bookland estates from ordinary taxation, from gafol and feorm.

Repartition.

3. Important features of every fiscal system are its method of collection and scheme of repartition. In regard to the last, it is clear from many passages in Domesday Book that it was the result of two processes which counteracted and checked one another. The more apparent of the two is the subdivision of the total sum of the tax, first among the counties and hundreds, then within each hundred or wapentake among the estates attributed to it, in a certain fixed or customary proportion, ultimately within each estate among the hides or geld-carucates and their fractions.¹

The process is especially clear in the case of the Suffolk and Norfolk assessment, where each manor is charged for so many pence of every pound to be paid by the hundred. But in a different way it ought to hold good also in the scheme of repartition exemplified by the south-western Geld Inquest, when each hide had to pay 6s.

The hides of the geld, the fiscal hides for which land has to defend itself, are grouped into hundreds which ought to correspond to their names, and it has been shown that hides are indeed distributed in hundreds, double hundreds, triple hundreds, half hundreds, and hundreds and a half, within the country, and that these numerical divisions correspond to territorial districts. In the Danelaw the hundreds appear as artificial combinations not of hides, but of geld-carucates, oddly enough twelve to the hundred, the hundred being in this case 100 tofts or tants. We find even that the single townships or manors are rated in very even numbers as groups of 4 hides or 10 hides in what may be termed Saxon England, and groups of 6 carucates, being halves of the hundreds of 12, in the Danelaw.¹ Fractions and combinations appear, of course, but they mostly resolve themselves into one or the other scheme—a decimal grouping or duodecimal grouping of geld units. These artificial subdivisions were not only employed in taxation, but also for police purposes, as we may gather from the division of hundreds into the police tithings of frankpledge, which are identified with townships in the same manner as the ten and twelve groups of the geld.² If we keep our eye particularly on the latter, we are led to consider the territorial divisions of the land as results of a scheme of repartition of hides proceeding from top to bottom, and naturally working itself out in round numbers and even fractions, which seem preposterously inadequate to represent the actual grouping of population and property. One feature, which had better be noted at once, is the fact that the schemes of repartition from above, as far as they can be traced, start from the hundred as a combination of townships and not of manors.¹ This surely means that the arrangement according to manors or estates was a later—a superadded—one, while in their original composition territorial districts reckoned with townships. This fact cannot astonish us, the more so as even during the whole manorial period the townships or vills remained in most respects the mainstays of police administration in the country.

And yet in the light of the data collected about exemption, reductions and actual hides, in contrast with geld-hides or geld-carucates, we may well doubt whether any explanation of Old English local arrangements which reckons only with these facts of repartition may be accounted sufficient. If it suits the state of a county after reductions, it will not suit its condition before them; if it holds good for the original scheme of distributing the fiscal units, it will be disarranged by any considerable change in this distribution. Indeed, no assessment can afford to disregard entirely the matter-of-fact condition of estates and villages, and the surest proof that the government had to reckon largely with such conditions is given by the compilation of the Domesday Survey itself, by this attempt to draw up a cadastre on a gigantic scale. The well-ascertained duality of the hide census,² the contrast between geld-hides and numbered hides or actual hides, gives us the clue necessary to solve these contradictions. The enumeration of the hides of a district presents the complex result of several processes, of a rough-and-ready assignation from above, of a much-discussed repartition among the parties affected by it, of rectifications and alienations, of a good deal of tinkering and wrangling. As a result, although in some cases the lines of governmental approximate assessment are still visible, in most we have to face a scheme much distorted and blurred in its symmetrical outlines.¹

4. As for collection and responsibility, they are to a certain extent dictated by repartition. A lump sum is laid on the town of X and the manors subjoined to it. The town undertakes to collect and pay in three-fifths of the sum, and the manors the fourth and last of these fifths.² In ordinary cases the repartition would proceed from the hundreds to the townships, but the manors would not be alien to collection; the concentration of private dues and the existence of a central force in the manor render it a welcome help in collecting geld and other taxes.³

¹ The East Anglian scheme gives a good example. In its most recent expression it gives up the hide computation for entire estates and appraises them in pence. Yet carucates, virgates, and acres occur all through this part of the Survey. They must be remnants of older computations which had lost their value for some purposes. Their numbers square more or less with the repartition into hundreds (e.g. Babenbergh and Blackburne Hundreds). As the possessions of the small freemen and socmen are minutely reckoned out in acres, it may be supposed that the carucate computation was kept up according to townships, while the estates were rated at so many pence in the pound. Cf. Dd. ii. 133b: (Happisburgh, Norfolk) 'Hapesburc . . . tenuit Edricus T. R. E. xiii carucatas terrae . . . et xxi sochemanni lxxxvi acras . . . et xii liberi homines de quibus habuit Edricus commendationem tantum iiii carucat. terrae. . . The manorial lord would be rendered responsible for the collection of the geld; there were even instances when the possession of estates depended on the payment of the tax.¹ When the manorial system became general, shares in the scot were distributed among the estates.² But behind this repartition according to estates stands the more ancient and symmetrical one according to townships, and at the time of the Geld Inquests and of Domesday the direct incidence of the geld is still distinctly traceable.³

and carucates hitherto mainly as units of assessment, and in this sense they appear most prominently in the Domesday Survey. But we have already had to note in several instances that hides and carucates are not merely fiscal units, but also shares in the land itself. In fact they were real, actual shares, and not ideal portions with rights in the arable, in pasture, and woods assigned to them.¹ Let us take for a starting-point the reference to a contest between Ivo of Taillebosc and Robert of Todení about two carucates less 30 acres in Lincolnshire.² The verdict of the jurors is that the parties should proceed to the place and divide the land in accordance with the repartition of the geld; the field measures have to correspond exactly to the fiscal units. Or, again, there were in Dunwich two carucates that had belonged to Edric in the time of King Edward. Now Robert Malet holds one, and the other has been submerged by the sea.³ The different hides of an estate may be given away separately to the daughters of a land-owner as marriage portions, or divided among co-heirs.⁴ In some cases a minute reckoning has to be made, and acres and tofts are subtracted from the main body of the holding.⁵ In fact, acres appear sometimes in combinations which leave no doubt as to their indicating real measures and not fiscal counters.⁶ By the side of them, culturae, cultivated areas which could evidently be identified by the local people, may be mentioned.¹ In many cases the 'numbered' hides in opposition to the geld-hides may have gone back to such real units. Every now and then one comes across attempts to distinguish the field-hides as carucates,² evidently because the term 'hide' had been too much used in the sense of a fiscal unit and had ceased to afford a sufficient clue in respect of agrarian occupation. When the hides, carucates, and sulungs lie in compact plots, which is often the case, they appear with distinct local names. In a manor of St. Augustine, Canterbury, for example, we find a sulung called Bevesfel (Bevesfield),³ in Sussex a half-hide receiving the characteristic designation of Halfeeldene⁴ (Half-field-den). The name of Fifehide⁵ (and Fyfield?) points to estates rated at 5 hides, and there are quite a number of instances where the holding appears in its most ancient aspect of Hiwisc,⁶ probably meant to designate originally an agricultural settlement estimated as a household-land in a country of wood and moors. These hiwiscs are, of course, apt to grow and to belie their ancient name, which remains significant nevertheless. In Anglo-Saxon documents the very boundaries of hides and virgates are frequently given.⁷

The quality of the local hides is sometimes noticed. In the same estate some may be better and some worse, as, for example, in Horton, Dorset, where the two best hides out of seven had been appropriated by the king for his forest of Winborne.¹ Again and again hides and their subdivisions are said to be laid waste. In Molland, Devon, one-half of a virgate is tilled by three oxen and the other half is entirely devastated.² In Mullacot, Devon, a thane holds one ferling out of half a hide, while the rest of the land is laid waste and used as pasture.³ The hides paying geld and the waste ones may be directly opposed to each other.⁴ A curious case is presented by the rural possessions of the borough of York. They were estimated at eighty-four carucates, of which every one paid geld like a house in the city, and was charged with the three obligatory public services in the same way as the houses. Of these carucates the Archbishop of York had six, and kept three ploughs on them. They were not provided with constant tenants, but cultivated in plots by the burgesses as leaseholds. A new pond made by the king had destroyed two mills on this land, and of arable, meadows, and orchards, a full carucate.⁵

There are interesting references to the number of acres contained in field-hides and field-carucates. In Betminster, Somerset, 112 acres of wood had been taken from an estate by the Bishop of Coutances, and a priest cultivated them as a carucate (plough-land) for 20 shillings a year.⁶ In Norfolk, 175 acres belonging to two socmen of St. Benet had been delivered as one carucate of land.⁷ On the other hand, we come across a hide of 64 acres in Gloucestershire, which seems Celtic, and finds its counterpart in Cornwall.¹ The Welsh hides mentioned in Herefordshire are characterized by peculiar rents, and kept distinct from English hides,² but, unfortunately, we are not informed about their composition.

A group of entries is made up of references to hides in wood and plain, the very term laying stress as much, or more, on the forest element in the hide as on its cleared, arable portion.³ This 'plain' portion of the hide may be spoken of as 'land' (terra) in opposition to the wood.⁴ Meadows were every now and then expressly mentioned as forming a part of the hide.⁵ Acres are also entered as measurements of arable and meadow.⁶ Such references fully bear out the main principle of the composite character of the holdings; these are not measures of land, but agrarian units usually including pasture and wood as well as arable. In fact, in estimates of the husbandry of a district or of an estate, pasture and wood are sometimes appreciated in terms employed primarily for agricultural purposes.⁷ We hear sometimes not only of acres but even of hides of pasture-land or woodland. It would be wrong to speak of a household rated as a hide as if it consisted of pasture, but pastoral units could be equated, as it were, to the standard of agricultural and mixed households. Such equations show, in any case, that dairy farming and forest pursuits were common in those days in certain districts, e.g., in the borderland of Wales. But the normal hide and the northern carucate corresponding to it were generally agricultural settlements, with pasture, meadows, and wood attached to them.

In view of such evidence there can be no doubt as to the close connexion between field-hides or field-carucates and their fiscal counterparts. But how are these facts to be reconciled with the other series of observations tending to show that round numbers and artificial repartition played a great part in the imposition of the geld? Two considerations help us to find our way out of this difficulty. To begin with, there is the well-established contrast between numbered or actual hides and the defence of estates for the geld. The latter, when stated fully and correctly, does not refer to hides, but to taxation for so many hides, or as if there were so many hides. Any one who has been assessed for local rates or for land-tax at the present day knows that if he is assessed for 100*l.*, this does not mean that he pays 100*l.* house-rent to his landlord. It will be 120*l.*, or something like it, as a matter of fact. The pound in this case is a notional one, and professedly smaller than the real. Even so, the geld-hide or the geld-carucate was a notional one, and though certainly not created without any relation to reality, it had to be treated and computed as a notional entity. But behind it stood the numbered hide or carucate, which had to be accounted for in making out scot and lot for many duties and burdens, and which referred directly to the hides and carucates in the fields.

Connexion between geld- and field-hides.

This is not sufficient, however, to explain the various facts brought to our notice by the evidence. There are clear indications that hides of a very unnatural, privileged extent were used not merely as fiscal figures, but as actual areas. When a district is said to contain a certain number of fiscal or geld hides instead of being described as defending itself for so many hides, this cannot be treated as a mere terminological transfer. The point was that even the notional divisions were actually stuck on the soil, marked off by boundaries, and so made real. Preconquestual charters often show that land was granted on the strength of approximate estimates which had to be made good by subsequent colonization. Even an entirely waste tract, or a territory with very few inhabitants, might be granted for so many hides, according to the estimate of the men of the country,¹ and the actual settlements grew up afterwards in greater or lesser numbers, while the original badge of the grant was carefully kept up. In such cases the hides of the charters would be more akin—at any rate at the outset—to the terra carucis of Domesday than to its geld units. The whole estimation must have been a very rough one, and yet it led to real delimitation and assignment of agrarian shares. The grantees had mostly good reason to keep up the original numbers, and they clung so firmly to the localities that sometimes they gave them their very names. In some instances, however, they proved premature and impossible to fill up, and, of course, alleviations of fiscal burdens were eagerly sought and commonly obtained on such occasions.

Summary. 6. The principal conclusions reached in this chapter may be formulated in the following manner:—

(1) The fiscal units, as they appear in Domesday, are variously constructed in different provinces.

(2) The reduction of local varieties to common standards was effected in the Exchequer by the help of estimates of ploughing strength in teams of eight oxen, and of the arable area in team-lands of 120 acres.

(3) The inland possessions of the kings, of the military and clerical class, were meant to be exempted from taxation.

(4) The repartition and collection of geld were originally in the hands of the townships, but the manorial lords were gradually made responsible for the latter.

(5) The fiscal units are based on real and local agrarian shares.

GOVERNMENT AND SOCIETY. GENERAL SURVEY.

systems.

THE government of England in the eleventh century presented all the symptoms of transition from one definite system to another. It was progressing towards feudalism, an arrangement of society on local lines under the guidance of a land-owning aristocracy. It was passing out of the stage of a federation of territorial communities of fyrd-worthy, mót-worthy, and fold-worthy men which had replaced the more ancient tribal arrangements. But the features of both systems were as yet intermixed in every sphere of life, and the elements of two widely different states of society were struggling everywhere, though the predominance of feudal tendencies was already manifest. From a historical point of view, however, for the purpose of tracing origins and determining causes, the features of the succumbing order are not less important than those of the victorious one. Thus, in the domain of military organization, we notice not only the decisive settlement of the armed force on the land as a means of providing for the necessary outfit and training of the typical soldiers of the time, the heavily equipped knights and the accompanying sergeants of light array. We have also to observe the remnants of previous military formations, thrust into the background, but still alive. Firstly, mercenary troops, which though very acceptable for their great mobility, better discipline, and good training, could not assume a leading part, on account of the lack of money in the royal treasury. On the other hand, the national levies of old have not been given up, but they have become a rare expedient, resorted to in times of great need; they were not efficiently trained, armed, and organized for effective warfare. The connexion with hosts of freemen in the past is especially clear in the case of the Danish here, settled in comparatively recent times, but it is sufficiently apparent also in the fyrð of the southern and western Anglo-Saxon counties. As for the military land-owning aristocracy in the foreground, its antecedents have to be traced from the companions of the Conqueror, to the picked array of mobile troops provided by the counties for the king's expeditions on the one hand, to the military following of king and magnates—the thanes and gesithcundmen—on the other. These personal attendants, especially valued for military purposes, live through the whole history of Teutonic nations, right from the time when Tacitus described them as the comitatus of the chieftains in his Germania. But while they played the part of a body-guard in the great wars and migrations of the tribes, they become more and more conspicuous and influential when the bulk of the tribesmen settle down to a quieter life, while the traditions of warlike prowess are still kept up in the immediate following of the chiefs and kings. The stamp is set on this development when the regular requirements of the king's expeditions come to be met chiefly by the service of military followers, and when these latter get more or less completely differentiated from the rest as a privileged land-owning class. This point seems to have been reached in most of the Anglo-Saxon provinces in the eleventh century. In the north and the east, however, the wider class of warlike freemen is still very clearly before us, but many of them have evidently to work hard for their existence, and have been subjected in many cases to the patronage and authority of the great, while others have lapsed into a more or less rightless condition.

Another aspect of the same process is presented by the history of jurisdiction. The popular courts experience a change in their structure and procedure as the aristocratic element of the good and lawful men, the elder thanes, becomes increasingly influential, and gets to be formally recognized in its leading position, in contrast with the majority of suitors who appear more for general support and special inquiries of a local kind than, properly speaking, for the administration of justice. But, what is of even greater moment, provincial jurisdiction gets to be broken up by franchises and private courts that crop up everywhere. It is evident that this movement made a thorough change in the position of the citizen classes of society. Instead of the simple, and, in a sense, democratic arrangement of the district court, discharging most of the juridical affairs of the free population, and conducting its business by means of the personal or virtual attendance of all the members of the local here, justice falls into the hands of numerous local potentates, who, though they have to administer it not individually, but through courts, turn this valuable regality into a means of exacting profits and grasping power. Suit of court must always have been irksome to those who had to attend, but when it came to be enforced by private lords it became a powerful lever for the reduction of smaller freemen into a state of subjection, which was not confined to a purely jurisdictional subordination, but constantly assumed the shape of tenancies burdened with rents and services. And, vice versa, tenants of great lords, liable to pay rents and to perform customary services, became naturally his subjects in respect of local justice and police. It is remarkable that the standing contrast between the Anglo-Danish north-east and the Anglo-Saxon south-west should have found expression, in this domain, in the special treatment of the soke, which remains specifically a free institution in the Danish districts, while it becomes amalgamated with other manorial franchises in the south and loses its distinct meaning of an institution derived from public authority over the free.

Taxation. The history of taxation is not less characteristic. Remnants of an ancient system based on personal progresses of kings, a collection of food rents, and an occasional commutation of such rents, are still clearly discernible on Royal domain and in newly acquired primitive districts. These rents were collected as a gafol from ordinary freemen, and not only from the serfs and personal tenants of the king. But the struggle with the Danes, the necessity of paying tribute to them, and of keeping up the costly military and social arrangements formed in the course of the wars, led to the assessment of the geld, an extraordinary and general impost which came to be a regular though never quite a general tax. The tremendous burden of the geld undoubtedly pressed down the lower classes into a more complete dependence on the wealthy and powerful, who had more means to meet fiscal requirements, could render help at the price of commendation or subjection, and gradually assumed a position of responsibility and authority in regard to smaller tax-payers. It is most important in this connexion that the gathering of the geld, though it was originally effected by the townships themselves, gets to be more and more dependent on the action of the manorial lords. Here again a humble communal institution is driven into the background by the stress of circumstances, and influential private lords take its place.

In another sense the evolution of the geld is characterized by the gradual combination between inland and warland, the land of the privileged military tenants, and the land of the gafol- and geld-paying common freemen—ceorls sitting on gafol land, as they are called in one of the treaties with the Danes. The inland was originally exempt from the ordinary taxes, because it served the commonwealth in a different way, by providing for the maintenance of warriors and clerks. But as its holders exercise supervision and are admitted to draw profits from the adjoining tributary land the inland home-farms get naturally combined with the wara districts attached to them. In one way this process has unpleasant consequences for the holders of privileged land: it obliterates the distinction between the two kinds as to tax, and we find both classes in the same position in regard to the geld as described by Domesday. But, on the other hand, the closer the connexion between inland and warland became, the more they came to stand towards each other in the relation of demesne and tenant land, the more closely was the yoke of the landlord riveted on holdings which may originally have been outside its economic influence.

Decay of free class.

The social results of the dismemberment of public institutions may be described in a few words: the decay of the class of small freemen, the rise of a landed aristocracy, the growth of a semi-servile rural population. It is impossible, at this stage of the inquiry, to estimate these phenomena at their full value and to fathom their bearing in every direction. There are economic influences and points of social organization which will have to be studied in due course in our second essay. But already the political processes on which I have dwelt hitherto afford some insight into the working of the evolution in question. It may be said that in a sense the lowest limit in the destinies of the free class was reached during the eleventh century. The desperate, though ineffectual, attempts of Anglo-Danish and Saxon kings to organize the commonwealth on the basis of thanehood led to a wholesale disestablishment of the twyhind class, of the ceorls who occupy such a conspicuous position in the earlier laws, and on whose shoulders the hundreds and wapentakes of the ninth and tenth century rested. These ceorls fall a prey to the colonizing sithcundman, to the ecclesiastical houses, and to the riding soldiers of the shires. In the southern and western shires they were almost entirely driven into the lower story of society, as peasants paying rents and performing services for their lords. In the Danish north-east a good number still survived, but they were losing ground daily, and the Norman Conquest came as a heavy blow to this particular part of the population, which was cut down, persecuted, and encroached upon, not only in the sharp social struggle for existence, but also as representatives of a stubborn and hostile nationality. After reaching the lowest point in its existence the free class rises again, and does so rapidly, but their new rise is connected, not with the traditions of popular institutions and ancient freedom, but with the economic superiority of the working population over feudal masters, with commutation of services, the growth of industry and trade, the spread of conventions and free agreements between masters and servants, the increased stability of social order and the increased force of governmental protection. It is not my business to speak of this tide of evolution in the present work, but it is not superfluous to draw attention to some of its most striking features in order to realize the very different meaning of the term 'free' in these distinct epochs and the importance of the feudal system which marks the watershed between them. The key to the earlier history is military organization, the key to the later is economic achievement, though husbandry evidently plays a great part in the earlier stage, and though the military factor is not eliminated from the later. Between the two epochs stands feudalism as an attempt to connect military organization directly with agricultural husbandry. As for the political institutions under the guidance of which both these epochs of national life went on, they may be contrasted on the lines of a predominance of the provincial organization of tribes and shires on the one hand, the predominance of the central power of the king and his council on the other. Again, by saying this we do not want to imply that provincial and local self-government did not play a great part in the political life of thirteenth-century and later England, or that national kings did not exercise a momentous influence before the Norman Conquest. But the main fact in the history of citizenship in Anglo-Saxon times is that it is derived from tribal and local associations, and succumbs with them. The main fact in the development of the State, manifesting itself roughly from the end of the twelfth century, is that the citizens are protected by central power and seek to obtain a direct share in the central power with its national councils and courts. Between the two epochs stands again the doctrine, and to a certain extent the practice, of feudalism, which throws local and provincial self-government into the shade, but considers the central organization itself as a federation of feudal potentates, and the country as a territorial union of baronies. Needless to say, in real life all these contrasts were not so clearly formulated as they look when put before the reader in a short summary of the situation. But it seems material to underline the leading principles even at the risk of some artificiality and exaggeration, if it is clearly realized that in the domain of facts and details we have to reckon with all sorts of modifications and compromises.

Semi-
servile

One political feature of the semi-servile peasant class created at this time had better be noticed at once, namely, the tendency to rule this class by courts, and not by personal commands and personal servants. Whatever arbitrary personal sway may have been exercised in practice by masters, landlords, their stewards and officers of various names, the communal arrangement of administration, justice, and police is always considered as the right and regular means of governing the humbler classes of the nation. This certainly need not be attributed to liberal instincts and considerations on the part of the predominant race, but it turns out to be the outcome of properly understood interests and of the necessities of the situation. The master's rule over slaves must have been at the root of the relation of the feudal lord to many of his dependants, but although many of the incidents of villain tenure undoubtedly go back to these attributes of slave-holding, the management of the affairs of the peasantry as a whole is not derived from it. On the contrary, in every respect, in regard to criminal and civil justice, to police, to conveyancing and to economic arrangements, matters are referred for discussion and decision to moots and courts. The past of these collegiate communal rights is demonstrably a delegation of powers which formerly belonged to the public courts of the provinces. The court leet is, after all, nothing but a specially important moot of the leta, the fraction of the hundred or wapentake alienated into private hands. The conveyancing business of the later court baron is derived from the feudal principle that every over-lord is surrounded by a court of his tenants in the exercise of his manorial rights. It is remarkable, however, that the undivided halimote of older days contains also the germs of the later customary court, both as to the conveyancing and voluntary jurisdiction of the villains, and to the economic management of rural affairs. Thus we have institutions and traditions of ancient freedom actually projecting into the sphere of semi-servile customs formed under cover of the manorial lordships.

In conclusion a few words may be said about the moving forces of the different systems which are seen to displace each other in course of time. When we consider the traces and traditions left by more rudimentary organizations in the eleventh century they appear before us in a state of decay. In order to understand their prolonged existence and great hold on the people it is advisable to look back and to realize that the institutions which seem so disarranged and out of date in the eleventh century have had their time of strength and glory and their adequate raison d'être. The expressions freedom, provincial self-government, or the modernized 'citizens', have almost assumed a negative colouring in the eleventh century, and refer to exceptional facts, numerous undoubtedly, but less numerous and less powerful than the facts of coming feudalism. But the older traditions may be traced back with perfect continuity to tribal organization and custom: they start from the conquering tribes settling on the soil of Great Britain in the course of the mighty invasions and migrations of Germanic and Scandinavian warriors. Tribal feelings were thus creative factors of political life. Their clearest expression may be found in the wergelds and blood-feuds, the procedure of oath-helpers and the various attributions of the maegths in the domain of civil law—in succession, guardianship, restraint on alienation, marriage, &c. Socially, they testify to a settlement in groups connected by blood ties and powerfully knitted together by common friendship and common hostility. The Scandinavian representatives of the period of migration, coming later than their German predecessors, and appearing for a long time as pirates rather than as regular settlers, show a much weaker sense of the ties of kindred, but they realized the necessity of joint action and neighbourly support quite as much as the earlier Germanic conquerors. With them the recognition of this social necessity takes rather the form of guilds or voluntary associations, with very strict rules as to the amount and character of mutual support to which the members pledge themselves. However this may be, in both cases the settlement on the land calls forth a modification of the earlier forms of solidarity; from being the product of blood relationship or of voluntary association they get complicated by neighbourly interests and the management of common agricultural affairs. Instead of the maegth and the guild, the township appears as the unit of social organization for the superior class descended from the conquerors. In some cases the union is a loose one, as between more or less detached settlements, possibly connected only by the interests of common rights in woods and pastures, in others it assumes the features of a very close agrarian community. But anyhow the discussion and direction of neighbourly affairs appears in the foreground as far as the union of the township represents active forces and interests. The passive side of these communal organizations is not less important. They have to assume duties in regard to taxation, police, and justice, for which they are held responsible by the general government of the country, and this ensures their vitality and continuity of tradition not less than the sense of active solidarity and the conscious resolve to act together against every one else. The townships are the links of a chain which appears more completely and clearly in the action of the hundreds, wapentakes, and shires. Though humble in their functions the townships are well worth the consideration which has been bestowed on them by historians. Whereas the hundred and the shire are, after all, judicial and administrative superstructures, the keeping up of which required a good deal of coercion by authority, the townships are directly grounded on the soil, and in most cases have to deal with tangible and everyday terests.

The weak sides of all these collegiate and communal institutions were determined by two awkward facts: they could not be protected against the growth of overbearing and overwhelming individualities; they were necessarily mixed up with a quantity of relations and customs, derived, not from the conquering, but from the conquered classes. From the first point of view one has to note that the rudimentary guarantees set by restraints on alienation and testamentary disposition, or rather by the lack of these judicial forms, by the agrarian arrangement of holdings and commons, &c., were partly swept away, and partly over-ridden, by the progress of husbandry, the struggle for existence, the prowess of leaders and military followers, as well as by the decay and the overcrowding of the weaker members of the communities. Altogether the township organization undertook to watch over the allotment of shares, but not over the relation between land-holding and population.

of communal institutions.

The difficult problem of maintaining the balance between members of the community in this respect was never tackled by the Teutonic townships. There was nothing to prevent men from thriving in consequence of a concentration of shares, and, on the contrary, there was not much to prevent shareholders from decaying in consequence of a congestion of claims. Such customary methods as were practised in such cases did not go further than the elaboration of rules as to undivided succession. These traits of agrarian life will have to be discussed at greater length later on. What seems material now is to realize that individual enterprise and power was not checked by the free township communities, and that they were very liable to be thwarted and subjected by the strong and the wealthy.

On the other hand, there was no hard and fast line between the conquerors and the conquered, the free ceorls or socmen and the geburs of base origin and custom. The two groups were dangerously near each other in rural life. It taxes our ingenuity how to draw distinctions between the various degrees of dependence and service—soke, commendation, tenant-right, semi-servile occupation, servile labour—and it is not to be supposed that it was much easier to do so in the reign of Edward the Confessor or William the Conqueror. The badge of wergeld was gradually losing its importance on account of the dismemberment of maegths, and of the introduction of new forms of punishment and responsibility. Thus while there was nothing in law to prevent entirely free and moot-worthy men from working with their own hands, contracting leases, working for other freemen by agreement or custom, as a matter of fact all these perfectly lawful practices led to a gradual debasement of the ceorls and socmen who had to resort to them, and prepared the way for that amalgamation of disparate classes in the mould of villainage which became the rule in feudal common law jurisprudence. No wonder that the political institution of the township itself, though originally certainly not servile in character, was drawn into subjection to the manor and treated by public authorities mainly from the point of view of a convenient machinery for the enforcement of obligations and the collection of dues and fines. But notwithstanding such historical deterioration, both the institution and the class for which it was devised did play a most important part in providing agrarian life with an element of independent right and traditions of communal action. Their meaning will be fully realized only when we come to examine more closely the conditions of rural life on their economic and legal side.

SECOND ESSAY
LAND AND PEOPLE
SECTION I: LAND TENURE
CHAPTER I
THE LEGAL FRAMEWORK.

1. ONE of the advantages of the study of English land law is that its feudal arrangement starts from a sharp division—from the general collapse of the old order in consequence of the Conquest. The Domesday Inquest as a whole is a testimony to this fact, and special quotations are hardly needed to prove it. Still it is not without interest to notice that even the smallest holder of land might appeal to the clean sweep made by the French invasion. Godwin the beadle holds half a hide from the king in Soleberic, Bucks. It was held T. R. E. by Alric Bolest, and the new tenant had evidently to vindicate his possession against the old one or his heirs. He appealed to the fact that by the coming of King William the former owner forfeited his right.¹ If some Englishmen still held land it was by express grant from the king, and although, as a matter of fact, they would resume their former estates, the title under which they came to hold henceforward was a new one—it was derived from an express or implied grant of King William.² From a stray notice about the manor of Stanton in Suffolk we learn that these partial resumptions were accompanied by heavy payments. In the time of King Edward this estate was held by a certain Ulwar in the soke of the king. At the time of the Survey it was in the hands of the Abbot of Bury St. Edmunds in mortgage for a loan of 2 marks gold, 'when the English redeemed their lands.'¹ It is not exactly clear what Engelric had to do with the loan, but the main fact that a large sum had to be paid at the time of the resumption of estates by Englishmen is sufficiently established. As regards the French, the counterpart of resumption were the grants and 'liveries' gradually effected by the Conqueror in the course of his acquisitions of the territory of England.²

livery.

There were various modes to confer title to land and to tenants possessed of land. We hear, for instance, that fourteen freemen in Lineforda and Ickeburc in the fief of Walter Giffard had been commended to the predecessor of Ralf de Waer (Ver), and were afterwards delivered (liberati) to Bodin de Waer on behalf of the king. But Ralf de Ver obtained possession over them as belonging to his fief, evidently on the strength of his having stepped into the shoes of his Saxon predecessor. Hervey de Ver held these freemen of Ralf when the latter forfeited his estates. Walter Giffard must have got them after this forfeiture from the king. Livery by the king and claim on the strength of rights derived from a Saxon predecessor are in collision in this case.³ In another

Norfolk case Godric held in Bradeham one-quarter of a carucate from William of Warenne. The land was taken into the king's hand when William de Warenne incurred forfeiture by treason. Robert Blundus held it in farm from the king, and Godric was marked in the Exchequer in the king's writ or breve for 20 shillings. And yet it was resumed by William de Warenne. But the hundred could not testify to having seen a writ or a king's messenger who delivered the said land to William.¹

Kelvendun in Essex was held by a certain Ailricus in the reign of King Edward. He served on board Harold's fleet against the Conqueror, and on going back fell ill and gave the estate to St. Peter of Westminster. The Abbey held it at the time of the Survey, but they had no title from King William, neither through a writ nor through a message delivered by a king's servant.²

A similar dispute occurred in regard to Spersold, a manor in Berkshire held by Anskitill from the Abbey of Abingdon. The shire gave testimony that the estate had belonged, before the Conquest, to Edric, who held it of the king in alod. This Edric had given it to a son of his, who was a monk in Abingdon, on the understanding that he should hold it in farm and supply Edric with the necessities of life from its income, and that after Edric's death the manor should go to him. The men of the shire did not think that it ought to appertain to the Abbey on the strength of such an arrangement, and they had never seen a royal writ or seal in testimony of its having been granted to the Abbey. The monks maintained, however, that they could produce a writ and seal of King Edward. Several legal points have to be noted in this case.³ The transaction between the Saxon owner and his son is not deemed prima facie sufficient to create a title for the monastery. Is it because it was merely intended to transfer the property after death to a definite person, who, though a monk himself, was not identical with the monastic corporation of Abingdon? Hardly; if the transfer to the son in regular orders were recognized, very little would have been wanted to perfect the transaction by a further transfer to the Abbey. Besides, the contention is not between Abingdon and the heirs of this monk, but between the monastery and an outsider. The point in dispute was evidently whether sufficient confirmation of the devise, by the king, was extant. Edric had held in alod, that is, in free property, with the right of selling it. And it is very significant that the writ under seal required by the shire to make the transfer perfect was delivered, not by King William, but by King Edward. This means that royal grants, or private grants confirmed by royal seal and writ in favour of ecclesiastical institutions, were recognized after the Conquest on the strength of the ancient deeds. Confirmations are indeed frequent and important for practical purposes, but the Saxon royal grant is sufficient in law. The same may be gathered from a reference to the sake and soke of freemen in Suffolk, which was granted to Bury St. Edmunds by King Edward. The sheriff had infringed the privilege of the Abbey by fining one of them 4 shillings, but the hundred did not admit that Bury St. Edmunds could be disseised by right after it had received the grant from King Edward¹.

An execution by King William of a writ under seal of Writs. King Edward is noticed in the Survey of Dorset. St. Mary of Shaftesbury recovered possession of Cheeseburne and of Sture, two manors appropriated by Harold, on the strength of a writ of King Edward ordering their restitution.¹ We have no means of judging in this and similar cases how far the documents appealed to were genuine. Many of the deeds produced by churchmen on such occasions were forgeries, but the point of importance for us is not the genuineness of this or the other charter, but the fact that a grant of King Edward was admitted in a court of King William as sufficient evidence of title. The mode of procedure adopted by the Norman king follows closely Old English precedents² in such matters.

The 'breve' appears in yet another sense, as we have already had occasion to notice in the case of Godric in Bradeham. It was applied to enrolments in lists of estates belonging to divers fiefs: 20 acres in Marsam in Norfolk are, for instance, enrolled and measured in the 'breve' of St. Adeldred.³ It seems that official lists are meant, and it is not unlikely that, in regard to some of the fiefs at least, such lists may have been kept at the Treasury. The Liber Eliensis might be described as such if it had not been primarily made for the use of the lordship and not of the Crown. The compilation of Domesday rendered minor enrolments of this kind unnecessary.

to a Saxon into whose place he had stepped in regard to rights¹ of all kinds. This important mode of acquiring title is constantly referred to in the Survey, and need not be dwelt on at length, as it has received considerable attention from modern inquirers, and is not subject to controversy. Its special interest from a legal point of view consists in the fact that it ensured a wholesale reception of Old English land law by the French conquerors. This stock was considerably modified by foreign influences, but it was never entirely given up, and forms one of the distinct elements of English law even in later times.

Alienation. The tutor mentioned in some few cases² appears on a very different plane. He is the warrantor, the auctor to whom those who have acquired derived possession have to appeal—the donor or vendor or lessor or over-lord, as the case might be. This standing to warrant leads us to a class of dealings which is independent of the original acquisition of estates by the conquerors or their resumption by the conquered. It belongs to a wide group of transactions concerning land. In regard to these we observe, firstly, the celebrated distinction between landowners who could sell or give their lands and those who could not; secondly, between those who could go with their land where they pleased and those who could not. Both distinctions are Old English. The second, derived from freedom of commendation, lapsed after the Conquest, as voluntary commendation ceased to be a recognized institution.³ The first, dealing with freedom of disposal, disappeared in another sense, as all land-holding became tenurial, and therefore the consent of the lord was required in case of any alienation. This consent could be forced in most cases, on condition of paying a more or less heavy fine.¹ But the significance of the distinction rests mainly on its use in Old English times. In the passage to complete feudalism marked by the Conquest it led to the subjection of many tenants to lords on the strength of the assumption that if a person could not sell his land, his tenement was to be considered as a part of the estate to which it was appendant. As regards Old English law, the freedom to give and to sell was one of the distinctive features of the privileged mode of tenure created by book, and its history ought to be considered in connexion with that of book-land.²

The Domesday Survey discloses some cases of interference on the part of the king in the making of private grants which may be derived from the principles of privileged book-land. The cases in which it applies are, however, always instances of grants made to churches,³ and it seems that the motive which led to the king's confirmation or concession was derived from the fact that the king lost some of his dues by the passage of property into the hands of an ecclesiastical body, a consideration similar to that which prompted the drawing up of the Statute De religiosis in Edward I's time. However this may be, the demand for royal confirmation shows that in such cases the right of the king to exert an influence over an estate which had been in private possession for some time had not disappeared and might be exercised occasionally. On the other hand, we find indications of a procedure reminding us of the precariae verbo regis in use at the beginning of the Carolingian dynasty: I mean cases where ecclesiastical institutions are driven to concede land to military tenants 'for the love of the king'.⁴ Notwithstanding all reservations

An eventuality which may be noticed because we come across it in the sources, but which does not constitute a distinct mode of conferring title, is the 'exchange' (escangium). A person may, for example, receive some estate in exchange for another situated in Normandy² and presumably acquired by the king, or he may obtain a plot in exchange for another taken up for the building of a castle³ or for inclusion in a forest.⁴ Juridically these are only cases of receiving an equivalent, although, as a matter of fact, they may have been compromises after dispossession. The abuse of right is even clearer in the not infrequent cases where the tenant has nothing better to appeal to than the exercise of administrative discretion by the sheriff.⁵ Freemen are accommodated in this way to estates of influential men from which they had previously been entirely independent. A number of the 'invasions' by great people are traceable to such exercise of arbitrary power.⁶

Before leaving the question of title I should like to revert to the fact that the practice of grants in military tenure was to a large extent conducted by ceremonial feoffment without any charter.¹ This led to a great deal of uncertainty in the status of such tenants, and to the necessity for the Crown to draw up special feodaries and to demand formal returns. From a juridical point of view it was important, because it led to the employment of inquests and of recorded proceedings in the feudal courts. One of the reasons for the speedy formation of regular courts baron must have been the necessity for securing the legal establishment and transfer of title.

charter.

But the practice is not feudal in its origin. It may be traced to distinct precedents in the Old English and Scandinavian public courts. It was, in fact, the necessary outcome of the requirements of alienation in an age and in a society which were not much conversant with writing, and had to rely on public declarations and on the memory of witnesses to keep up the validity and the legal tradition of acts.

One more eventuality has to be considered in connexion with title, namely, settlement in the case of disputed claims. The judicial treatment of such cases needs no consideration, as it is not more peculiar to the eleventh century than to any other. But the procedure of the Domesday, following on wholesale appropriation and transfer of property, brought with it the necessity of summary adjudication between rival claimants, and thus Domesday Book itself gets to be not merely a statement of fact as to the distribution of property and fiscal dues, but also a record of title. We need not speak of the important issues which turned at a later time on the entries as to the Ancient Demesne of the Crown. But it is to be noticed that the Clamores and Invasiones which are noticed throughout, and sometimes brought together in separate columns, were materials for actual adjudication, and in a few cases we actually catch glimpses of these quasi-judicial proceedings occasioned by the Inquest. One of the most characteristic is the notice in the Exon Domesday relating to the manor of Olwritone in Devonshire. It was in the hands of the Abbey of Tavistock at the time of the Survey, and the Abbot rested his claim on the fact that an antecessor of his had held the estate before him. But the barons sent by King William to inquire into the state of land-holding in England disseized the Abbot because the English jurors gave witness that Olwritone did not belong to the Abbey on the day when King Edward was quick and dead.¹ The entry is curious in many ways. It shows, to begin with, that the Exon copy of Domesday had been written for the use of the Abbey of Tavistock, or, at any rate, by scribes prejudiced in its favour, and this at a time when all the operations connected with the Survey had come to a close; it is retrospective in its character, and tinged by a certain prepossession. And, incidentally, it gives direct evidence as to the power of the barons of King William, his commissioners, as we should say, to disseize a tenant, that is to settle in a decisive way disputed questions of title and to transfer possession. They act in accordance with the evidence tendered by the English, that is, evidently, of the English jurors of the hundred, and the latter evidently had given their verdict on the strength of the tradition as to title preserved in the hundred.

2. Before discussing the main characteristics of tenure as shaped by the Conquest, I should like to say a few words about transactions which did not transfer ownership nor constitute tenant-right. Leases were frequent in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, although not so frequent as nowadays. The law of mortmain, by which the Church with its immense possessions was ruled, produced an exuberant system of long leases, and the disabilities of entail and privileged tenure further developed the peculiar growth of long leases in English law. Taking our stand on the Domesday Survey, we notice of course only a few of these transactions, as the object of the cadastre was to describe tenure, income, and fiscal liabilities, and not flitting incidents of possession. Yet we catch some glimpses of the features and tendencies of the law as to leaseholds. To begin with, we find in operation a practice famous in its Continental parallels under the name of precaria remuneratoria. Its object is to attract certain plots of land into the possession of the Church by granting estates of the latter for temporary use, with a reversion of both to the institution granting the lease.¹ Sometimes the reciprocity of obligations is not apparent on the surface. The grant of a piece of land assumes the form of a one-sided concession of usage,² but it is hardly likely that the Church should have been guided on such occasions by purely benevolent intentions; the gain to her corresponding to the concession made must have consisted, in these cases, in indirect advantages, such as the protection and help of an influential person, a sheriff,

¹ Dd. i. 208 a: (Hunts) 'Terram Alurici de Gellinge et Eminge-forde testantur fuisse S. Benedicti et eas fuisse concessas Alurico in uita sua tali ratione quod post mortem suam debuerant redire ad aecclesiam et bocstede cum eis. for instance,¹ or in the need to avert greater losses. The clause guaranteeing reversion was in any case intended to preclude too gross encroachments on the rights of the Church. A very characteristic group of conventions is formed by leases for three lives, which seem to have been especially common in the estates of the see of Worcester.² This is again a form of land-holding which played a great part on the Continent, especially in Italy.³ It was a kind of compromise between the tendency towards concentration of property in the hands of a few great potentates, and the dissemination of profits among a numerous class of their retainers and servants. The Church brought this particular form of lease into practice on her territory in order to secure at least some supervision of her rights and interests in cases which would have led otherwise to the constitution of downright freehold and military tenure. The obligations incumbent on the tenants for three lives instituted by Bishop Oswald of Worcester were those of knights and sergeants, but the holdings conferred on them were subjected to a clause of reversion after three lives which put the bishop in a position different from that of an ordinary feudal lord in regard to his tenants.⁴

tenant or to the owner. Besides the difficulty of enforcing covenants and of getting suitable lessees, the tendency of the tenants was decidedly to install themselves in conditions as like perpetual tenure as possible. It was the position which answered best to the investment of capital in land on the part of the tenant, and to a husbandry working more for consumption than for the market. Short leases were also inconvenient for the great landowner, because of the difficulties of administration. It is very characteristic of the steady change for the better, in regard to social protection and intercourse, that short leases become more and more common from the end of the thirteenth century, and begin to transform the economic system based on hereditary tenant-right. We shall have to revert to these phenomena when the time comes for discussing the husbandry of our period. Now we have to take into account on the juridical side that such contracts as the Italian libellos,¹ commonly concluded for twenty-nine years, are out of place in the England of the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Nor is the colonia partiaria, based on the division of profits between the tenant and a lord providing the implements and capital of exploitation, reflected in the sources. Leases at rack-rents occur but rarely, and they are mostly produced by efforts to get waste land under some kind of cultivation.² Here again Continental practices present instructive parallels. The hospitality offered by ecclesiastical institutions and great men in Capetian France to settlers (hospites) started generally from an entirely precarious tenure, but led in many cases to the development of thriving colonies with privileged tenant-right for the 'guests'.³ Although this kind of hospitality was not quite so much in fashion in England, both the term and the thing existed there.¹

The fief.

3. The terms feudum, fevum were imported into England by the French phraseology of the conquerors. They do not appear before the Conquest, though one may certainly speak of Old English land tenure as to a great extent feudalized even before the invasion of the Normans. Still, the terms and the corresponding definite legal rules were certainly taken over by these latter into the conquered kingdom. The most usual sense of the term feudum or fevum is, indeed, the complex of estates held by a lord after the Conquest: there is, for instance, a fief of Frederic, the brother of W. de Warenne,² or a fief of the Bishop of Thetford.³ But such general mentions show, according to French mediaeval ideas, that the estates were held of somebody; in the case quoted, and in most of those which occur expressly, they are held of the king. The term 'feudum' implies the feudal nexus, and the virtual repartition of the whole of England into fees amounts to the admission of the famous rule formulated later on by the lawyers of Northern France: nulle terre sans seigneur—'no land is held without a lord,' as we might describe it more lengthily in modern English. This rule, though not expressed in as many words in the Survey, is indicated in several passages. There is, e.g., a claim of a certain Norman Crassus in regard to a house in Lincoln. It belonged formerly to the Abbey of

Peterborough, but the Abbot omitted to pay geld for it, and it was taken over in mortgage (in vadimonio) by Godred, the Saxon predecessor of Norman Crassus, in payment for $3\frac{1}{2}$ marks of silver. The transaction is interesting in yet another way, indicating, as it does, the burden of the geld; but the point to which I should like to call attention on the present occasion is the fact that Norman claims the house as of the king's fee,¹ and this can hardly mean anything else but that he was enfeoffed on behalf of the king with the estates of Godred. We have here an interesting clue, showing that the feudal principle was introduced by the very process of the original distribution of land after the Conquest. This is also expressed indirectly in two disputes between Roger Bigod and Roger de Ramis as to land in Suffolk. The latter challenged the possession by Bigod of the land which had belonged to Wicolf, and all the freemen whom Warenger held of Bigod, asserting that the estates in question had been delivered to him earlier than to Bigod. The hundred did not know what to say, because Warenger, who had evidently been the Saxon owner, held of both litigants. Warenger himself, now sunk to the position of an under-tenant, gave witness in favour of Bigod, but Roger de Ramis did not submit, and contradicted this testimony by all legal means.² In Staham seventeen freemen had been 'added' by Bigod to the manor in the reign of King William, although his Saxon predecessor had not had any right in them. Roger de Ramis contended that they did belong to his fief before Bigod got any land in Suffolk; the hundred testified, however, that

² Dd. ii. 338 a, b: (Hunston, Honington, Suffolk) 'Totam terram Wicolfi, et hos omnes liberos homines quod (sic) tenet Warengerus de Rogero Bigot calumpniatur Rogerus de Raimis et dicit quod sibi liberatum fuit priusquam Rogero Bigot. Et hundret nescit ex hoc uerum dicere, quia ille Garengerus de utroque tenebat, sed tamen ille Warengerus reuocat ad feudum Rogeri Bigot, et Roger de Ramis hoc contradicit omnibus legibus

Roger Bigod had received them in connexion with his fief before Roger de Ramis.¹ Not only the collision in regard to feudal rights derived from delivery by the king is to be noticed, but the fact that these rights were conceded, not piecemeal, but en bloc, by reference to Saxon predecessors. This involved the application of a double rule: the extent of the estates comprised in the new tenure was regulated by the limits and incidents of the old preconquestual one; at the same time the character of the tenure incurred a change, for instead of the various forms of land-holding known to Saxon times the uniform feudal tenure appeared. We see that, e.g., a relation based on mortgage (vadimonium) is converted into an ordinary feudal tenement.

Feudal

This does not mean that the fiefs derived from the new feudal nexus were not beginning to be differentiated in their turn: frankalmoign, burgage, socage, sergeantry develop by the side of the main military tenure, and all these varieties have roots in the past as well as in the more modern feudal law. But whereas in Saxon times they grew without any direct and necessary reference to the king's grant, as results of independent legal forces, the introduction of fiefs transformed all these relations into varieties of one main feudal group. Taking frankalmoign as an example, we find, on the one hand, an exceptionally privileged tenure based on the substitution of prayers and ecclesiastical performances for material service, while in the preconquestual period the freedom from gafol, geld, and various other public obligations is an immunity of certain churches, or estates, or parts of an estate, and not the basis of any specific tenure. Indeed, these immunities fluctuate according to times and reigns, sometimes amounting to an assertion of the exemption of all Church property, while on other occasions they are restricted to a few emphatic cases of exemption.¹ Burgage tenements are indeed specialized by their position and obligations from Saxon times, and the Norman invasion did not make them more peculiar than before,² but socage tenure, or non-military freehold, does not appear as a feudal tenure at all before the Conquest. The freemen who could sell their land to whom they pleased were not feudal tenants in the later sense, though many of them may have been commended to one or the other magnate, and though the rest held under the king, but not from the king in the feudal sense. It is perhaps the best place here to notice a legal fallacy which comes to play a great part in the social history of England. I mean the treatment of small freemen as king's tenants in the counties where such small freemen were still very conspicuous. Sometimes this is done in such a way that we perceive at once the late introduction of the feudal principle into their condition.³ In other cases, however, they are described as king's tenants or freemen on the king's estates, as though this were already their specifically feudal condition T. R. E. and before. In truth this sliding into the feudal groove is only one of the expressions of the general growth of aristocracy culminating in the Conquest. Its seamy side was the absorption of such small freemen by great lords and church institutions. I am not speaking of the economical evolution involved in this process, nor of the numberless acts of violence by which it was characterized, but of a juridical element connected with it, namely, the

The contrast I am trying to express may be too pointed when reduced to such very modern definitions, but I hope my meaning will not be misunderstood when I use them to substantiate this contrast.

Alod.

It is from the point of view of Old English and not of postconquestual tenure that another celebrated term used in the Survey must be explained, namely, alod, alodium. The term is again French, and is celebrated in the history of Continental law for the opposition presented by it to the term feudum. But then no such opposition is traceable in the English common law after the Conquest. All ownership of land resolves itself into tenure, and is derived ultimately from a royal grant in consideration of service. There is no independent property in English feudal law, nothing like the dominium of Roman law, or even like the aleu of Southern France, where the maxim 'nul Seigneur sans titre' obtained, that is, the rule—no one is deemed a lord unless he proves it. Why should, then, the French lawyers of the Conqueror speak of alods in England? Evidently because they came across forms of land-holding in the conquered country which struck them by their resemblance to the aleu of France. At the time of the Survey it may have been even doubtful whether such forms should not continue to exist in the new kingdom, because the county courts and the hundreds were still more familiar with them than with the feudal productions of the Conquest. The possibility of such a development was cut short by the jurisprudence of the central royal courts, which systematically enforced and developed the feudal doctrine. But it is interesting to note how often the great Survey appeals to alodial law, in order to characterize the land-holding of its time. The direct references to land held in alod are always to T. R. E., usually with the adjunct de rege.¹ Thus it is assumed that the land was held

of the king. But it would be wrong to say that the alod meant land held of the king as opposed to land held of other persons. To begin with, there are numbers of cases when land is held of the king without any alodial qualification; in fact the majority of the tenentes in capite held of the king without any reference to alod, and were meant to hold fiefs. Nor were their Saxon predecessors described as normally holding in alode. The mere tenuit certainly does not imply it. In some cases alod is said to be held of the king and even of private persons.¹ Once, although alod is not directly mentioned, an expression is employed which seems taken as an equivalent to it: it is 'in propria libertate de rege Edwardo'. This is opposed to in presto,² 'by lease,' 'in concession,' which applies to another manor held by the same person. The three manors held 'in propria libertate' in his own franchise, or perhaps 'in free ownership', seem to have been at the full disposal of the owner, while, of course, in regard to the fourth he had only a conditional use. And this can be applied, as it seems to me, to the other cases where alod is used, or, to express it more cautiously, to most of these cases. Alod is the land in the full and free disposition of its owner, the terra testamentalis of the charters, the terra quam vendere potuit cui voluit of the Domesday Survey. Such land ought, of course, to be normally under the direct supremacy of the king, and the feudalists of the Survey put it as if it were held of the king even T. R. E. They might have pleaded for their treatment of this derived alodial possession, that it had its roots in royal grants, and that the king's confirmation or additional grant is often resorted to when it comes to the eventuality of making use of the owner's full powers. Still the language of the charters, if we read them right, does not warrant the feudal assumption of the compilers of the great Survey.

One or two small but curious results of the difficulty experienced by feudal lawyers, when they came across non-feudalized tenures, may be noticed in the description of Middlesex. We find in Osulvestone Hundred 12 acres termed 'de nanemaneslande¹'. Their value is and was five shillings a year. It is entered as held by King William, and is said to have been held in the same way by King Edward. No man's land would stand directly in the king's power under any régime, but perhaps the identity in the way of 'holding it' attested by the Survey was not quite a literal one. The same expedient of assigning the king as lord has to be resorted to in regard to persons who have no actual lord to appeal to. In this same Middlesex hundred are to be found 30 cotters who are said to belong to the king, although they are not assigned to any manor. They pay altogether 14s. 10½d. a year. Two more are to be found in Holborn paying 20d. a year. All these small people, possibly squatters, at any rate scattered tenants with infinitesimal holdings, are in the custody of the Sheriff of Middlesex.² They are mentioned outside the boundaries of the king's estates. Yet they are said to belong to the king, and

² Dd. i. 127 a: (Middlesex) 'In Osulvestane Hundret tenet Willelmus rex xii acras terrae et dimidiam de nanemaneslande. Haec terra ualuit et ualet v solidos, hanc habuit rex Edwardus similiter. this is surely the most appropriate way of defining their position in a feudalized State.

4. Let us look at some consequences of the feudal as- Service.
sumption. The principal is that land is always held for service. There is no use of land to which corresponding service is not annexed. Therefore 'tenet' and 'servit' are two sides of any tenure. We hear, e.g., of a 'remuneratory' concession on the land of St. Bennet of Hulme. Edric holds two carucates in 'Haninga' of the Abbey. Of these one-half belonged to the Abbot, and he conceded it to Edric, while Edric in return gave to the Abbot the other half out of his fief, and the whole of Huningham was then held by him of the Abbot and acquitted of service.¹ It happens sometimes that several brothers are possessed of an estate; it is a common thing in such a case that the juniors should serve the senior representing the fief.² The view that every tenement should be justified by service places jurors into perplexity when it has to be extended to preconquestual condition. In Warram, Lincolnshire, the title of Walter d'Eyncourt goes back to the possession of Tori T. R. E., but a certain Norman held it after him at the same time, and the men of the locality and of the wapentake do not know by what pact 'he had it, as they did not see him do any service for it'.³ The passage admits of different construction in its details. The post eum may be literally after him in point of time, Norman taking the place of Tori, and it being uncertain

³ Dd. i. 361 a: (Somerby?, Lincs.) 'In Summerdebi habet Tori ii carucatas terrae et ii bouatas ad geldum. Terra xviii bobus. Ibi Raynaldus homo Walterii (de Aincurt) habet ii carucas et v uillanos cum una caruca et dimidia . . . Walterus habet Warram. . . Hoc manerium tenuit Tori T. R. E. et Norman post eum eodem tempore. sed homines patrie et de Wapentac nesciunt quo pacto habuit, quia nullum seruitium inde uiderunt illum facere.'

by what service he came to hold the manor of the king. Eo tempore would then merely stand for T. R. E., while pacto would have to be taken in a general sense 'in what way', 'in what manner.' On the other hand, one may construe pacto and eo tempore literally—'by what convention' and 'at the same time'. In this case post eum would have to be taken in the sense of 'behind him'; Norman would be a mesne tenant, what the French called arrière vassal, and what the Germans, in a rather lower range of relations, termed Hintersasse. This seems the more probable explanation to me, but, in any case, the doubt of the jurors remains characteristic; they thought they had to look primarily to service in order to determine the quality of the tenure.

Looking back to the reign of King Edward, it is found that the 'service' chiefly implied in the tenure of estates held directly under the king was military service, in fact the military service of the fyrð, which came to rest primarily on the landowners.

The following passage hardly admits of any other explanation. The brothers Chetel and Turver held an estate in Covenham in inheritance from their father. They had divided it, but Chetel had to acquit it as a whole of the service of the king, not, however, without assistance from Turver.¹ Another case of the same kind occurred in Swanetone, Lincoln: Alsi and Athelstan held there one carucate to the geld, and Alfric their brother had soc over them in Hazebi, only in regard to the king's service.² It seems obvious that this passage also refers to a joint

pillers of the Survey that in such a case they would enter the land under the general rubric of the king's possessions. The freedom referred to in the description of Photestorp, Norfolk, seems of another kind: it is freedom from subjection to the Church, in fact an assertion of independence which would make the owner a tenant in chief performing service to the king.¹

tion.

One of the consequences of this doctrine as to service is the value of the latter as a recognition of tenure, quite apart from its material importance. Everybody knows the significance attached to the payment of a pound of pepper or the presentation of a rose, from this point of view. We can trace the practice in Domesday. There was a complicated dispute in Norfolk about the tenure of 30 acres in Mundeham. Alfric had held them T. R. E. from Archbishop Stigand. He was outlawed, and the king's reeve, Ulketel, seized the land into the king's hands. Roger Bigod obtained the possession of it from King William, but Count Alan claimed the holding as having belonged to Earl Ralph (Guader) in his manor of Rumburgh. In giving evidence on the claims, the men of the hundred made statements about the recognitions and services performed by Ulketel, who, evidently, had kept the plot in his direct use. He had recognized once a year Count Ralph before the latter forfeited his estates, and in the same way he had once performed service in Rumburgh after the forfeiture; but, on the other hand, they had heard Ulketel say that he owed service to Roger Bigod.²

A special recognition was due in case of a change of tenants—the beginning of relief.

It would be difficult to say whether it began to be in use in Edward the Confessor's reign. It is noticed about a Hampshire thane that he omitted to make the customary recognition to the king after the death of his Uncle Godric, who held the land before him.¹ The men in question are Saxons, and hold from the reign of King Edward, but the change of tenant may have occurred after the Conquest.

Recognition of lordship in regard to land and corresponding service as rent occurs certainly before the Conquest.² There is a curious entry in the narration of the Acts of the Monastery of Worcester. A Dane of the name of Simund, a thane (miles) of Earl Leofric of Mercia, is said to have devastated Crohlea, an estate of the monastery, and to have nearly deprived it of cultivators. The Prior at last gave him the land to hold during life on the condition of performing the fyrð service for the abbey by land and sea, and of making recognition of the lordship of the Prior by the yearly presentation of a horse or of money instead.³ The narrative may excite suspicion as to details, but the institutional features of it are hardly likely to have been devoid of foundation in matter of fact usage.

incidents.

Some of the casual incidents of feudal tenure appear in rudimentary form in the Survey. We hear, for instance, that a lord gave away land held of him together with the daughter of a deceased tenant¹; this evidently refers to the marriage of an heiress in case of failure of heirs male. The material part of another transaction is not so clear: it may be prompted by the desire to provide for the aged widow of the deceased. Or else the widow herself may get married to the new tenant of the fief.² But we see that the marriage right of the lord is neither a formality nor a mere pretext for levying a fine. The payment of heriot is, of course, Old English, but it is quite distinct from the relief of a particular estate or fief. The latter is a payment for renewed investiture, the former a resumption by the lord of part of the equipment or stock conferred by him on a retainer.

The heriot varies greatly with the status of the vassal, while the relief, after a long period of struggle and arbitrary exactions, settled down into a kind of tariff graduated according to the quality of the fief; barony, knight fee, and serganty being appraised differently, while socage tenements were held to be exempt from relief—probably a recognition of their being more ancient than feudal tenure and therefore exempt from one of its most characteristic incidents.

5. The Domesday Survey pays a good deal of attention ^{Parage*} to one form of tenure which it distinguishes carefully from ordinary tenements. I mean the tenure in parage (in paragio). It appears as a preconquestual tenure—people are not said to hold in paragio or *pariter*¹ T.R.W.; the notices in question are introduced by tenuerunt.² Now there seem to be two clues for the explanation of the term and of the tenure. In a certain number of cases the words in paragio and pariter are glossed by the expression libere inserted over them.³ In keeping with this we find that when a thane, holding in such a way, has for some reason to pay a certain rent, this is mentioned as an exception and introduced by a tamen.⁴ Then again we find people holding tenements in such a manner, who are styled alodiarii, so that the tenure is assimilated to alod.⁵

² Dd. iv. 246: (Tintinhull, Somerset) 'Tintehella quam tenuit Alnodus Abbas Glastingesberie (Glastonbury) die qua rex Edwardus fuit uiuus & mortuus. In ea sunt vii hide & i uirga. Cf. 257 Cocintune (Somerset); also i. 60 a (Peasemore, Berks). I do not wish to imply that the tenure was unknown in Normandy. On the contrary, the term 'parage' is French. See Ancienne Coutume de Normandie, c. 30; cf. Viollet, Histoire du droit civil, 841 f. But, as a rule, the French tenants did not use this tenure in England.

The freedom of the tenure is sometimes sharply contrasted with a subsequent reduction to dependence within the farm of a manor.¹ And yet we must notice at once that in a number of cases these very people were not free to go with their land where they pleased.² As in many other equally well attested instances the freedom to go where one pleases is expressly affirmed,³ we have to infer either that there were local variations in the conception of the right in question, or that the qualification as to freedom to go or not to go where the tenant pleased was not deemed essential to the tenure. And after all, the freedom in question is more a personal than a tenurial trait ; it corresponds to the right of commendation according to choice, and although the position of the tenement was affected by it, still the relation may have been construed on the personal basis. In any case, we constantly find free tenants hampered in their freedom of going where they please with the land.

The meaning of paragium, if we start from these passages, might seem to be land held by a peer of the lord. But it would be rash to stop at this conclusion. There are other passages which lead us one step further and give a more explicit interpretation of the term. The Hornecastle Wapentake gave testimony in a dispute between the Bishop of Durham and Odo the son of Spirewic, and the whole Treding of Lindsey confirmed their verdict, that there were three brothers, Harold, Godwert, and Alfric, who divided the domain of their father aequaliter et pariliter; the two elder divided also the soke of their father, the third not taking part in this, and they held it aequaliter et pariliter at the time of King Edward.¹ And, again, the men of Calnedestou Wapentake testified, with the consent of the Treding, that Siwat and Alnod and Fenchel and Aschil divided aequaliter et pariliter between them the estate of their father, and held it in such a way that if it was necessary to go in the king's expedition Siwat should go, if he could, and his brothers should help him. After him the second went, and Siwat with the others assisted him, and so forth. But Siwat was the king's man.² It cannot be contested that the equality and companionship in this case apply to equality between co-heirs in rights and duties, although one is regarded as the representative of the holding before the king. Indeed the cases are exactly on a parallel with instances already quoted of a division between co-heirs not destroying the unity of the obligation resting on the estate. Nor is there any reason for doubting that in the frequent cases when several brothers, or co-heirs, are simply said to hold pariter or in paragio, this kind of joint family tenure was meant. In a Gloucestershire instance five brothers holding in this manner are expressly styled peers (parcs).¹ The cases when only one person is mentioned as having held in paragio need not disturb us,² as the nature of the tenure was not altered by the accidental fact that there was only one heir to succeed to it. He might have three sons, and then the parage succession and parage tenure would come to their right again. Besides, in some cases the chief representative of the fief might be mentioned—Siwat in the Lincolnshire case just quoted. It is more difficult to explain a Somerset case, in which the two brothers holding pariter had divided the succession in such a way that one held five hides and the other one hide. They could not be said to hold aequaliter, and if they held pariter it means that they were compeers in the quality of their holding: there was no subinfeudation, but a transfer to two of obligations and estates which were formerly held by one and seemingly still continued a unit in respect of service.³

But how is one to explain the fact that, in the instances first referred to, parage is taken to be synonymous with free tenure? The probable explanation seems to be, that the two attributes were taken as coincident, although not directly derived one from the other. As a matter of fact, Old English free tenure, the ordinary tenure of thanes and persons of similar standing, was not necessarily reduced to unity by a rule of primogeniture, but descended to all the sons.¹ Yet the unity of the tenement and of the service attached to it asserted itself in a remarkable way. The one and full service was due from the estates divided or held jointly by the co-heirs, and one of the tenants was regarded as the representative of the whole, although he was assisted in the performance of his duties by his compeers, and might be even replaced by one of them. Now the doctrine of later feudalism was different, and much more stringent. The common law made a thorough distinction between tenements not to be subjected to partition, inasmuch as they were burdened with foreign or military service, and socage tenements which might be partitioned without detriment to the service.²

The unity of service brought about a unification of the tenement, while the Old English tenure of parage had merely provided rules for the execution of service by joint parceners. It is in partible socage and in gavelkind³ that the rules of the parage succession of the Saxon age continue to be admitted. But it by no means follows that parage was the only rule practised in Saxon times. The way it is mentioned in Domesday makes it all but certain that by the side of it unified succession did exist. If it had not been so, one does not see the reason why parage should be specially marked again and again. Of the cases where it does not occur, many must have been cases of unified succession, instances where the unity of the holding was upheld by custom. And, after all, impartible Socage and Borough English¹ go back to Saxon times quite as much as parage does, while odal succession appears as an ancient and independent Scandinavian custom.² The buying out of some of the co-heirs, the customary interdictions of the marriage of juniors and the position of their offspring—the Haustalden (bachelors) of Continental usage—must have had their counterpart in those districts of England which developed primogeniture and junior right in order to ensure the efficiency of husbandry and service in unified holdings.³

Bequests.

6. The effect of the law as to bookland is yet very noticeable in the Survey. It was sometimes emphatically styled terra testamentalis, and this expression, which originally applied merely to the charter (testamentum) creating title, was soon understood to refer to the right to bequeath land according to the wish of its owner. This right of free bequest expressed itself mostly in the endowment of churches, and provision for women members of the family as against the claims of the kindred.⁴ The Worcestershire Survey has a most curious entry illustrating the mode of making a 'cwiððe', a testament that should stand at law. A dying man calls to his bed his son, his wife, and several friends, and addresses them with the words: 'Hark, my friends. I will that my wife shall hold this land which I bought from the Church as long as she lives, and after her death let the Church from which I had it take it. And should any one encroach on this land, let him be excommunicated.' This is attested by the best men of the shire, who presumably were among the witnesses called to the death-bed.¹

Mentions of women holding land are not unfrequent.² One is even termed liber homo.³ The estate of a widow is taken from her if she marries a second husband before a year has elapsed⁴: does she lose her freebench in this case, or is the forfeiture a consequence of the unseemly behaviour of the woman? It seems that the second explanation is more to the point, as in the first case the use of a deceased husband's estate should lapse when his widow marries again, irrespectively of the time when she does it. The origin of the estate had to be carefully looked into, if one may judge from a Norfolk case where Roger Bigod had appropriated two estates of a Saxon antecessor, of which only one had belonged to him in full property, as was substantiated by the fact that his son and widow still lived there, while the second estate was only under the patronage of Bigod's predecessor and was in truth free—that is, the property of the tenant subject to commendation.¹

A most interesting though unfortunately an isolated case is reported from Yorkshire.² The jurors state, namely, in regard to land that had belonged to Asa, that the whole of it ought to go to Robert Malet, the Norman successor of this lady, as she held her land quite separate and free of the power and the dominion of Bewulf, her husband, while they lived together, so that he could not dispose of it by grant or sale, nor could he forfeit her land. Afterwards they were separated, and she retired with all her land and was possessed of it as its owner (domina). Here we come across a clear case of a married woman owning land in her own right, and independently of her husband. Ultimately the consorts get separated, and the lady exercises the full right of ownership over her land. For a commentary to this passage we have to look, not to feudal law, but to the Saxon practice of marriage contracts described in the fragment on wedding.¹ By such contracts the disabilities in regard to donations and sales could have been easily imposed, whereas by Norman law even estates inherited by heiresses, 'ex parte sororum' would have at once lapsed into the administration of the husband's, and, indeed, would have become indistinguishable from other parts of the husband's estate.² The separation is also curious. It is not called expressly a divorce, probably out of regard to the doctrine of the Church, but it recalls to mind the views on separation admitted by Scandinavian and early Teutonic legal custom.³

I have touched on this evidence of the wide-reaching capacity of women for holding land because it is characteristic of the later Saxon law, and quickly disappears under the influence of feudal jurisprudence, which favoured the stronger sex. But, notwithstanding some recent attempts to interpret these expressions of woman-right as primordial traits of Teutonic society, I think it still sufficiently established that the feudal doctrine only reverted in this case into an ancient groove, legal custom having been originally among the Germans, as well as among other tribes, in favour of the succession of male kinsmen to the land.⁴ Therefore it seems to me that woman-right originated to a large extent in the rules of privileged land-holding—book-land law, and those of privileged inheritance—the 'cwiðe'.

The word bócland very often meets the eye on the pages Bookland. of the Survey. But it occurs always as a place-name. I shall not treat here of the much-discussed problem of book-land-right, except in so much as it may help to illustrate some points in Domesday. One of these is not difficult to perceive. Bookland stands clearly in a kind of opposition to laen land, although a laen might be constructed in writing, and therefore give origin to a bóc. Yet in the terminology of the Church of Worcester, which was especially apt to use written instruments for transactions which created only laen,¹ the latter is clearly distinguished from bookland possession.² The term had evidently ceased to be used in a lax sense, at any rate in the eleventh century, and carried the meaning of full ownership with it. The precision of the juridical privilege involved in the grant of bócland is further illustrated by the instruments which convert estates into Royal bóclands for the use of the kings.³ It seems at first sight rather superfluous that sovereigns should go to the length of instituting bócland possession for themselves, as it stood free to them to make use of bookland privileges in regard to bequests and grants whenever they pleased. But the institution of such privileges was not arbitrary in the sense of being a one-sided and free expression of Royal will; it required certain forms, and especially the consent and attestation of witan.⁴ Besides, the deeds by which the kings created bócland for themselves had an immediate effect on the status of the land and its obligations, inasmuch as they usually freed it from all common burdens and impositions, except the trinoda necessitas,⁵ and sometimes perhaps even from this latter.¹ At any rate, exemption from gafol, from the harbouring of messengers and officials, from all kinds of onerous customs (consuetudines), and in a few cases from the geld, was common. The indirect consequence of the bookland charter serving as a basis for all kinds of transactions not warranted by tribal custom was not less important. It would be interesting, indeed, to solve the question, in which of the Domesday entries we have to recognize bookland grants. The latter are so common and important at the close of the Old English period that we must expect to recognize them in something equally common and important in the Survey. It seems to me that the only category of T. R. E. tenures which would correspond to bookland would be the terrae liberac, the alod tenements which receive in some cases such a special position in the Survey. This can hardly be proved without possibility of doubt, but besides the general agreement of attributes I may be allowed to quote at least one passage containing a direct translation of the one term by the other—I mean the spurious Latin charter ascribed to Eadred,² and presenting a transliteration of a Saxon, probably genuine, grant. The ‘boclanda’ of this latter appear in the Latin copy as omnes liberac terras, &c. The Latin document is a forgery, but it was forged by people who were cognisant of the institutions of their time, and though we consider the equation merely in the light of a gloss, we could not dismiss it without paying attention to the clue it gives us.

The opposite to bócland is folcland, the land held Folcland. under tribal custom. The passages in which it is mentioned expressly are well known, and they may probably be supplemented by one or two passages speaking of

terrae reipublicae iuris, a sounding expression which can hardly have meant anything else.¹ Domesday does not name folcland, but it contains at least one passage which seems unmistakably to point to it. From the description of Lincoln we learn² that a ploughland consisting of twelve tofts and four crofts belonged T.R.E. to the church of All Saints. A certain Godric, son of Gareuin, held it; he became a monk, and thereupon the Abbot of Peterborough seized the land. But the Burgesses of Lincoln maintain that the Abbot has it against law, because neither Gareuin nor Godric nor anybody else had a right to give the land outside the city and outside their kindred, unless by leave of the king. And, therefore, Ernuin the priest claims that church, and what appertains to it, in right of inheritance from Godric his kinsman. This is clearly a case of collision between the interests and legal customs of maegths and local communities on the one hand, private individuals and churches on the other. The latter had the means of breaking folkright custom on such occasions, but these means had to be derived from a special leave of the king creating privileged land tenure. According to the verdict of the townsmen this necessary process had been disregarded in the case in question.

If we ask where what used to be folcland has to be sought in the Domesday Survey, only few places will be found suitable for it. From the T. R. W. point of view all land had been converted into freeland, in the sense of depending in one way or another on the king, or on lay or clerical lords endowed with franchises from the king. Somebody has the freehold of every estate, as we might say in words borrowed from later usage. It is true that the service privileges of the free tenements had shrunk to very little ; this was partly the consequence of political arrangements, which were already forming themselves at the close of the Danish period, with its huge burdens of extraordinary taxation, partly the result of the Norman doctrine of service. Yet the free tenement quality of the bookland survived in a transformed aspect after the Conquest. As for folcland, it has evidently to be looked for on the Terra Regis, with its remnants of the small freemen of Saxon times, and in the tenements of those among the socmen, freemen, and villains who were not considered as mere serfs of their lords.

7. One more species of land tenure remains to be considered—namely, Corporate ownership. It does not often appear in the Survey, but it appears in some cases very clearly. There are, to begin with, the cases of ecclesiastical corporations. The tenure of sees and monasteries receives an individualistic colouring by the reference to some dead saint to whom the church was dedicated. Administration itself was also mostly in the hands of personal rulers—the bishops, abbots, priors, &c. The share taken by the communities themselves is not very apparent, though certainly it did exist, and was sometimes expressed in forms dictated by the Romanized Church law¹. Nevertheless, communal tenure and administration are sometimes visible in the Domesday Survey, as, for instance, in the case of the Canons of Chichester, who held ‘communiter’ sixteen hides free from geld². We do not know how this large estate, on which four plough-teams were kept, was managed, but the tenure is defined in a very precise manner, and it is not material whether the hides in question were leased to a farming bailiff, or cultivated in plots by small tenants, or partitioned according to some rotation between the canons themselves; the basis of the tenure is undoubtedly collectivistic, and there does not seem to be any sufficient reason for calling it joint ownership; the canons are, after all, the members of a chapter, and not individuals who find it expedient to put their separate rights together. A similar corporative construction seems to impose itself in the frequent cases of ownership of land by cities. All the burgesses of Oxford possess in common the pasture outside the wall which is called Port Meadow to the present day. The expression—all the burgesses—might have led to misunderstandings by itself, but, in conjunction with 'in common', it can mean nothing else but the fact that all those who claim burgess-right in Oxford are entitled to be considered members of a community to which Port Meadow belongs. They had other rights and duties besides; they stood in scot and lot for many purposes—for discharging fines, for keeping up buildings, for providing for market police, for repairing walls and bridges, &c. Some of these duties were distributed among the householders; for the performance of others there must have been a common chest.¹ But though the boundaries between the rights of individuals and those of the community may have been very uncertain and wavering, the essence of the tenure in common, in distinction to joint tenure, as expressed in parage, for instance, is clearly at hand in these borough cases, not only because the term 'communis' is used, but chiefly because the right evidently springs from a constant relation of the members possessed of it to a higher unity—the city or the chapter. This supplies the independent aim and the continuity of existence which distinguish a corporation from a joint-stock undertaking, and in comparison with these features the modes of actual exploitation and the division of profits play a secondary part.

² Dd. i. 17 a : (Sussex) ‘Canonici de Cicestre tenent communiter xvi hidas quae nunquam geldauerunt sicut dicunt, et ibi habent iiii carucas in dominio. Hoc ualet viii libras.’ Cf. i. 2 b : ‘in communi terra S. Martini sunt cccc acre et dimid. quae sunt ii solinos et dimid.’

There is a good deal of information on similar communities in preconquestual England. Not only towns but shires appear in a corporate capacity, own property and receive bequests for the discharge of specific duties.¹ What is more interesting, we not unfrequently come across references to common lands in documents treating of rural England before the Conquest. Sometimes the word 'gemæne land' occurs in the descriptions of boundaries.² Sometimes, again, a plot is said to lie within the common land.³ Now these expressions may mean either commons in the present sense, that is, unenclosed spaces accessible to everybody, and reserved for the use of all the members of a township or several townships, in regard to pasture and wood; ⁴ or else they may indicate open fields divided according to certain rules between the members of these townships. The latter is, for instance, evidently the case in regard to two and a half hides in Dumbleton, conveyed by Æthelred to thane Wefric in 995. The whole village is said to be situated in communi terra, and it is made 'free of all exactions, except the well-known threefold duty, according to the usual bookland formula.¹ It has to be noted that the common land does not receive thereby a new arrangement; we have not to deal with an inclosure act, or a grant in private property of land which had formerly been held in common. The newly created property, for all its privileges, remains a part of the common land within which it lies. The words of the document indicate therefore clearly, as it seems to me, that the grant concerns two and a half hides as shares in an open-field township, the holdings of which could not be recast at pleasure, either by the grantee or by the king, evidently because the open-field arrangement was the result, not of the economic convenience of a lord, but of intermixed rights. This reading is supported by the testimony of several other charters. The same king Æthelred gave in 983 four hides and a half to a thane of the name of Wulfgar. The whole lay in communi terra, but in two patches—three hides in Drayton, and one and a half in Sutton. The hides subject to the transfer are said by the king to be mei proprii iuris, and, on the other hand, their situation 'in common land' is not altered by the grant;² the right passing from the king to the grantee is therefore a complex of shares in two common lands or open-field townships. It is expressed in terms of full private tenure, and yet it is subordinated, in a way, to the common-land arrangement. The same feature may be noticed, in a perhaps even more characteristic way, in the case of a grant by Æthelred to Archbishop Ælfric. The king grants twenty-four hides in three places, which had been confiscated from a woman who had committed fornication. Of these, seventeen hides lay to the west of the Essingburne, two on the eastern slope at Eastun 'sorte communes populari'; the rest lay in woody denes on either side of the brook Pidwell. Now the second batch of hides lay evidently in intermixture with shares in common fields distributed according to popular usage.¹ An important piece of evidence is also presented by a charter of Edgar, by which he granted ten hides in Winterbourne to his thane Eadric. Of these, five hides lay at Weston in severalty (syndries landes), and five at Easton of common land (gemænes landes). In the description of boundaries, the qualification of land in severalty is repeated in regard to the Weston portion, and as for the Easton one, the common-field quality of the land is expressed even more fully; the five hides have to be assigned out of the common-field as much as appertained thereto.² There can be no doubt that in a series of instances land granted in general terms could have been described in exactly the same way, and that such specific references were omitted merely because it was not worth while to insert them. We shall have to come back once more to the open-field system as a feature of economic condition. In the present instance it was important to notice it in its bearings on tenure and conveying. It came forward especially in smaller donations, because such grants broke up the fields of a township into several fractions, whereas big grants mostly included entire villages, and there was therefore no occasion for dwelling on the open-field arrangement. It seems almost as if the quality of common land was especially connected with folkland possessions; the expression in Æthelred's charter of 1002, 'sorte communes populari,' can hardly correspond to anything else in the vernacular. But although originally the common fields may have been considered as characteristic for the settlements of freemen under tribal law, in the eleventh century the system evidently extended to all classes of property. There was, however, this material difference between the cases when it was applied, that in some instances it still retained the character of an independent kind of land tenure, while in other instances it merely survived as a customary arrangement subordinated to the feudal title of the chief tenant. In any case it is important to notice that the references to collective tenure do not diminish as we go back in the course of centuries. Domesday in all its bareness supplies us with some, and Old English documents give us a good many precious indications in regard to its existence and peculiarities.

HUSBANDRY

I. THE natural conditions presented by the territory of England are not of such a kind as to direct the distribution of the population and its economic pursuits in any particular way. There are no steppes like those of South Russia or Hungary, which incite and almost oblige early settlers to wander about with their herds of horses and sheep. The greater part of the country is not mountainous like the Alpine districts, where settlements and cultivated plots are by necessity concentrated in narrow valleys or scattered along the slopes and ridges. The climate and soil do not favour the growth of the vine or the culture of olives, which give the husbandry of Southern France and of Italy its stamp of intensive, individualistic care. In some parts of England, however, notwithstanding the temperate climate and the fact that the soil might be turned to account in different ways, certain natural lines of development suggested themselves, especially at a period when the accumulation of capital and international intercourse did not materially modify the results of economic geography. The large forests intersecting the territory in all directions, and particularly dense on the borders of Wales, the fens and marshes so frequent in the eastern counties, the invasions of the sea on the low East coast, the advantages afforded to early agriculture on light soil and the necessary employment of large teams on heavy clay soil, not to speak of other more technical features, gave a certain bent to the husbandry of different districts, a bent which time and circumstances might change, but which has to be reckoned with as one of the factors of the economic problem.

Another range of influences comes from what may be called the historic side—from the customs of the tribes occupying the soil, from the political advantages and drawbacks of concentration and dispersion, from the relative strength of social classes and from governmental policy. Without attempting to give a systematic account of the action of all these elements, we shall have to attend to them in studying the evidence as to economic life in the eleventh century.

Types of
settlement.

The first problem which it would be important to solve refers to the modes of settlement at this particular period. Did the people live in close clusters or in scattered farms? Were the existing villages large congregations of houses and dwellers, or hamlets of medium and small size, counting a few houses and plots? These are questions on the settlement of which a good deal depends in the arrangement of all other economic traits and processes. When a farmer has to perform his task in an isolated homestead with the help of a few 'hands' belonging to his family, and of a small number of dependant labourers, his work and needs, and the very basis of his husbandry, his plot, are different and differently organized than when he joins in a vast agricultural undertaking, where a definite place and share is assigned to him on condition of his following the rules and customs adopted by the community.

It is not difficult to see that England was not given over to one particular system of settlement, although villages were more common than single farms or small hamlets in the greater part of the country. But it would be difficult to speak of one system as overwhelmingly predominant in the same sense as the Gaards (single farms) are predominant in Norway, and the by's, or clustered villages, in Denmark; or as the Dorf (village) was prevalent in the greater part of Central and Southern Germany, while the Hof (farm) was prevalent in the north-west, and especially in Westphalia.

Single
farms.

The single farm occurs, to begin with, in forest districts. It appears sometimes as an isolated homestead among the woods. Perhaps the most characteristic description of such a settlement in a wild region is afforded by the passage in the Hereford Domesday relating to Eardisley. It is a plot which does not pay geld, nor render any customary payment or service, nor belong to any hundred. It lies in the midst of a forest, and there is one house in it which may be 'defended'. There is one plough-team belonging to the master of the house, and two serfs to work with it, and one Welshman pays a rent of three shillings.¹ It is not always quite so easy to make out these scattered homesteads, but there is one clue which seems sufficient to identify them, namely, very small numbers of plough-team oxen and a small working population. I mention these features together because it is conceivable that a settlement endowed with only one team or less might occasionally contain a pretty considerable population occupied with pastoral or forest pursuits.² Still, as a rule, low figures for teams and labourers show that the settlement was a small one, although it would be difficult to draw the line between single farms and hamlets. In the absence of other data, a low figure of assessment may serve as an indication of such a small settlement, and in the collection of rough statistics it is useful to look to these figures too, especially in cases where there are no other means to distinguish between the component parts of a large aggregate.³ The possibility that in some cases the dwellings of tenants in a village may have been scattered about without regular alignment in streets⁴ is, of course, of a totally different kind. It concerns the manner in which villages themselves were built—whether the dwellings were disposed at random, ut fons aut nemus placuit, or constructed in regular rows connexis et coherentibus aedificiis. But in both cases we should have to deal with villages, not with single farms.

Hamlets. Altogether, the passage from the one type of settlement to the other is not sharply defined, although the central conception of each type may be quite clear. When we speak of hamlets, for instance, we mean a cluster of 2-4 homesteads with their plots, but on the borders of the group there may stand single farms subdivided among co-heirs, so that the original unity is giving way, or, on the other hand, small villages of 6-11 houses which in other respects would not differ much from the hamlets first named. As, however, it is the general character of the settlements that we are examining, and not minute distinctions which it is out of the question to establish on the strength of written summaries compiled 800 years ago, we may rest content with the contrast between averages, and speak of a cluster of 2-5 homesteads, on an average, as of a hamlet, while a cluster of six or more homesteads would form a village. The administrative category of the township is not applicable here, because in many cases such townships, though officially termed vills, were artificial combinations of several small settlements for purposes of police and administration. A good example is afforded by the dale called Langdendale in Derbyshire, on the border of Cheshire; it is unified by its name, and represents a vill and a manor in the Survey. Yet it consisted, as a matter of fact, of a string of small settlements of a couple of farms each, and these hamlets composing the administrative township were ranged along the dale at intervals of one or two miles, the whole dale covering a long, narrow range of some twelve miles in length.¹ The 'berewicks' of some of the royal manors in Derbyshire must have presented apparently the same character of small hamlets.¹ In Derbyshire the formation of the country, with its dales, may account for the generally small size of the settlements; there was no space to expand in, and the homesteads arranged themselves along the short water-courses in a kind of 'corridor' system. On the borders of Wales the single farm and hamlet arrangement was produced by the tribal habits of the Celts, subjected to Norman sway, but still keeping to their customs. Among these, one of the most remarkable was the re-arrangement and scattering of homesteads in consequence of divisions and re-divisions among heirs.² This tribal practice of division, involving the assignment of separate dwellings and plots according to gwelys and gavels, seems curiously reflected in Domesday in the enumeration of clusters of Welsh villages standing under one reeve. Each of these clusters numbers from 6-14 villae, usually approximate multiples of 7. The groups are probably formed for the purpose of collecting rents in honey, milk, cheese, &c., but the units composing them are certainly small, as one reeve was deemed sufficient to oversee from 6-14 of them, and the analogy of the laws and extents of Wales shows that we have before us hamlets or treus grown up in consequence of tribal division and colonization.

In the case of Derbyshire and Wales the peculiarities of geography or of tribal custom seem to account for the scattering of dwellings and settlements. The surveys of Lincolnshire and Yorkshire show that scattered hamlet and homestead settlements would arise occasionally in broad plains and among Scandinavian settlers. The description of Stalingeburg, for instance, mentions a central village belonging to the lord of the manor, containing one carucate and two bovates to the geld, but land for two ploughs and a half (300 acres). This was settled by a group including, besides one plough-team in demesne, a labouring population of 5 villains, 3 socmen, and one bordarius household—very small tenants owning another team, probably, one ox per holder, and a garden-plot for the bordarius. The soc of this manor was disposed in scattered homesteads with distinctive names: Hegheling estimated at 1 bovat, Cleia at 3 bovates, Ternescou at 2 bovates; in all, 6 bovates to the geld. The estimate must have been very close to the real quantity of the holdings, as there was only land for one plough and two bovates for all of them; there were also eight tenant households in the aggregate, 5 socmen and 3 villains, with one plough between them. Whether they managed to unite their beasts of draught in order to form the team,¹ or resorted to small ploughs in order to utilize their oxen, we cannot tell, but the fact of the division into three settlements seems firmly established, and there would fall only two or three households to each of these.² It is impossible to guess at the reason of such a scattering in every concrete case. It would be wrong to ascribe it to ethnographical reasons, as settlements in big villages were quite common among the Danes, both in their native country and in England.

Large
villages.

Nor could the settlement in separate farms be made a mark of the personal freedom of the tenant. Socmen and liberi homines occur in large villages, while villains and serfs are quite common in hamlets and single homesteads. The result must have been produced by circumstances attending the occupation of the district, or by natural features which are hidden from us. Anyhow, it has to be noticed that Lincolnshire and Yorkshire are very rich in big villages, especially the former. I may refer to Calthorp,³ where there was land for 48 ploughs in demesne and in soke.

The demesne portion was cultivated by 3 teams only, but 113 socmen had 32 plough-teams among them, and 50 villains with 7 bordarii had 13. Chircheby may be taken as an example of a medium-sized village. It contained, besides some land in demesne ($\frac{1}{2}$ car. to the geld), a soke divided between Stratone and Chircheby, and inhabited by 18 socmen households and 16 bordarii, owning 6 plough-teams between them.¹ Spalling, again, may serve as an example of a large village chiefly inhabited by villains. It had 40 villain holdings, and 33 occupied by bordarii, and 13 plough-teams altogether, besides 4 teams in demesne. Its economic position in the district is characterized, among other things, by a market held there to the annual value in toll of 40 shillings.²

Careful topographical and archaeological studies will clear up some day many concrete questions in regard to the size and forms of settlement, but it is not without value to attempt on the strength of the Domesday Survey a rough statistical estimate of the relative numbers of villages, hamlets, and single farms in two specimen counties. The introductory remarks on the types of settlement will show the reader that this statistical sketch is presented with all reservations. Still, although there cannot be any pretension to exactness in such a case, even averages and approximations are better than blank uncertainty.

I have selected Derbyshire and Essex for the purpose. The two counties may be taken as interesting examples of the repartition of population in the midlands and in the southern counties. At the same time the Danish element is strongly represented in Derbyshire without being predominant there, while Essex, though substantially akin to Hertfordshire and Sussex, yet has many features in common with the East Anglian settlement, and especially Suffolk, from which it is divided by the slight demarcation line of the Stour. In regard to the soil and to the contour of the country, the two shires in question present a marked contrast; hills and dales are characteristic of Derbyshire, plains and marshes of Essex.

Settlements
shire.

Turning to the northern county,¹ we naturally find population more scattered, and concentrated as a rule into smaller groups. It is true that in some cases a rural organization described under one name in Domesday may in truth have consisted of several members only loosely connected with each other. But although this element of uncertainty cannot be eliminated, it is not unreasonable to suppose that in most cases the single place-name points to a 'nucleated' settlement of some sort, as the record is careful to notice over and over again the subdivision of rural units. Again, the Domesday entries are often complex and difficult to reduce to clear statements about settlements. But even if we put aside the instances which are too indefinite, or too involved, there remain a great number which can be analysed in respect to the size of the settlements described. It would not avail to take notice of the number of plough-teams at work in the different centres of rural population, because the large normal team of 8 oxen was nearly always broken up into fractions among the rural settlers, each household being possessed only of an eighth, or of a fourth, seldom of a half.

The best way seems to be to group the settlements according to the number of villains and socmen households assigned to them. The villains and socmen were the principal classes of rural tenantry, and held among them the regular shares of the field holdings, while bordarii and cotters came in as small tenants of a few acres or of cottages, and had better be left aside in a review of the main features of village settlements. Cottages, crofts, and huts were too unstable and too subordinate in their economic position to be reckoned with in the regular repartition of the arable and of its appurtenances to the holdings. In a minute study, based on topographical indications, the cottages may have to be taken into account. Nevertheless, a general statistical survey ranging over the area of a county may, as it seems to me, dispense with them, the more so as many of these cottages, like the plots of Scandinavian husmænd, must have been connected with the principal holdings and sometimes carved out of them.

We have unfortunately to leave out of account some important entries like Newbold or Bakewell, not because there is any doubt as to their representing large villages, but because their contents are combined in the Survey with those of their berewicks, and therefore cannot be tabulated. The largest village which admits of tabulation is Elmston (Helmstun), containing thirty-six households. Should we reckon on an average some five grown-up persons (over fifteen years of age) in a villain or socman household, thirty-six of the latter would contain roughly a population of about 180 inhabitants, besides the bordarii and cotters. This, however, would merely be a rough guess intended to give an impression as to the probable size of the settlement. The number of regular shares in the fields connected with separate households is, on the other hand, an attested fact, and by itself sufficient for our purpose. Of villages similar to Elmston there were very few in Derbyshire, but of single farms we also find very few—only six, with one household to each. In one of the two Somersalls (Alia Sumersale), probably the place known at present as Somersall Herbert, no tenant of the standing of a villain is mentioned, but there were six crofts held by bordarii, and we may infer that though there was no agrarian arrangement on the plan of apportioning yardland or oxgang holdings, the hamlet was formed of a cluster of cottages with some land utilized in one way or the other.

Hamlets, in the sense of small settlements containing from two to five households with regular tenements in the fields, are more numerous, some thirty-three, but still they form in the Survey only a group of 122 households in all, or about 9 per cent. of the tabulated 1,337 households of the county. A large group, in respect of the number of distinct settlements, is that of small villages containing from six to eleven households. Of such there are fifty-eight with an aggregate of 435, or about thirty-five per cent. of the tabulated households. I need hardly say that the lines of division between this class and the hamlets on one side and the larger settlements on the other have to be drawn in a somewhat rough and ready fashion. There is not much to choose between a hamlet of five households and a 'small village' of six, or between a small village of eleven households and a 'larger village' of twelve. Still the line had to be drawn somewhere, and the general classification answers the purpose, as it seems to me.

The 'larger village' group is represented by forty-three places containing 774 households, or 57 per cent. of the whole number of tabulated households in the county between them. The net result seems to be that the prevailing type of settlement in Derbyshire was that of a village of moderate size. The character of the country, except in the south and south-east, prevented the concentration of large bodies of inhabitants, but the population mostly clustered in groups of some 8-16 peasant households with shares in the field, and with varying numbers of cottages hanging on to them.

Essex presents a different aspect.¹ Before surveying the results of the tabulation of its recorded households I have to mention a special difficulty preventing us, as in the case of Derbyshire, from utilizing many important entries. I mean the fact that Essex socmen and freemen are often said to be added or appended (additi, adjacent, pertinent) to certain manors. It is generally impossible in such cases to make out whether the persons 'added' were actually living in the place characterized by the manorial name, or were only reckoned up with the rest of the manorial tenants on account of their jurisdictional and fiscal ties. The omission of the above-mentioned entries deprives us of the possibility of making an exact statistical estimate and of drawing inferences as to the distribution of socmen and freemen in the county. But it does not prevent us from using the evidence in order to form an approximate view of the prevailing types of settlement. Although the entries admitting tabulation are certainly incomplete, they fall into groups in accordance with the characteristic distribution of households. The first thing to be noted is the considerable proportion of settlements where no villains or socmen are to be found, but only bordarii; in one or two cases even servi alone. There are eighty-four such places. Their great number may be explained by two considerations: many of them represent villain and socmen households of the time of King Edward which have been brought low by the Conquest. In some cases, however, the insignificant allotments in land may be explained by some special pursuit carried on by the inhabitants, e.g. by fisheries. In any case, although we have to take note of this feature, it would not do to include these crofts and cottages in the tabulation of the households provided with regular shares in the fields. Turning to these, we find that the number of single farms is again small—36 out of a total of 381 tabulated settlements. Hamlets (2–5 households) are clearly represented by 115 settlements. Their relative social importance may be to some extent expressed by the fact that the number of households contained in them, 421, forms about 9·4 per cent. of the whole aggregate of tabulated tenements (4,526).

The group designated as that of small villages (6–11 households) may be reckoned at 97 places with 768 tenements, or roughly 16·9 per cent. of the whole. Lastly, large villages appear as the most characteristic type of settlements in the county, with 133 place-names and 3,301 households, or 73 per cent. of the tabulated tenements. The striking difference between mountainous Derbyshire and flat Essex seems strikingly illustrated by these incomplete but characteristic returns.

2. The examination of the forms of settlement has already made it clear that in a great number of cases the agricultural exploitation of the country led to the formation of compact plots. In those districts where the households of the settlers were scattered in separate farms there was no special reason to arrange the central part of the husbandry—the arable—in any other way than by disposing it in a field or several fields on the spots cleared for cultivation, and the only influences which exerted themselves on the distribution of those fields were the lie of the country, the quality and quantity of the soil at the disposal of the tillers, and the system of husbandry followed by them. There were no members of the townships with equal and concurrent rights to check the free disposal of the owner. Neighbouring claims and rights had to be met at the boundary of the settlement and not within it. The simple form of a compact plot, enclosed by fences, or at least marked off by definite limits, suggested itself naturally on such occasions. But, even in the case of a settlement starting from such a compact plot, several might supervene in its subsequent development which would lead to its breaking up, and to the appearance of more complicated agrarian forms. To begin with, there was the increase of population. In regard to the family of the owner, this increase meant the appearance of rights of succession, and in the cases of gavelkind, parage, and partible socage juniors were provided for either in the way of common management, or by the subdivision of the group. The two main varieties of partition would be—firstly, colonization, the migration of one set of tenants to some outlying part of the estate, or an altogether new place of abode;¹ secondly, the subdivision of the plots themselves into minor, but yet compact parts;² thirdly, the subdivision into strips with an intermixture of those tending to equalize advantages and disadvantages in the distribution of the soil.³

the formation of compact plots, namely, the case when the ploughlands of a settlement were kept asunder although they might be subject to subdivisions within these units. This meant that although partitions of property-rights were recognized and carried out, the unity of the ploughland was kept up on the territory. The scheme produced would be different from that of the ordinary open field, inasmuch as the holdings would not appear as bundles of strips dispersed in the different fields, each ploughland or field hide being represented in these furlongs and fields. The ploughlands, or at least their portions in the twofield or threefield courses of husbandry, would form rounded-off units on the soil.¹ Lastly, it occurred sometimes that, even in village settlements, the inhabitants received separate allotments, not intermixed, but by the side of each other. This was especially easy in level country, and in the case of small plots. We find such a system in connexion with the assignment of tofts in Danish counties.² Of course, my object in mentioning these forms is not to enumerate all possible varieties of agrarian arrangement, but to point to the main types. Every one of them would be seen to shade off gradually into the next one, if we came to consider the local varieties. By the side of the separate hide or plough-and, for instance, we should find the separate yardland,¹ and this would bring us already a good way in the direction of an intermixture of rights between members of the same village. And again, in Kent we should find that although sulungs and yokes are kept separate, a whole network of rights and material strips would arise within their precincts. The estates of the Abbey of St. Augustine, Canterbury, for instance, consist of sulungs distinguished by local names, and presenting rounded-off plots in each case. But the detailed thirteenth-century Survey in the 'Black Book' of the Abbey does not omit to mention numbers of coparceners to whom acres in these sulungs were assigned. Whether these acres were in each case kept materially apart from each other we do not know; it is very likely that they were often under the same management. But the rights were undoubtedly strictly apportioned. To take one instance,² in the sulung of Wisebech, John the son of Ecard and his peers (pares sui) held 15 acres, Robert son of Wulfstan two acres and a half, Richard son of Peres and his peers 9 acres 3 roods, John son of Sevenoth 3 acres half a rood, William Palmer 3 acres half a rood, the same of the land of Dede (de terra Dede) half an acre, the same of the land of Sperke 3 roods; Adam of Idleigh, of the land of Deme 4 acres, the same of the land of Christina of the Marsh 1 acre, the same of the land of John Stede half an acre; and so forth, to the aggregate of about 200 acres to the sulung. Some of the fractions are exceedingly minute—one Alexander son of Ralph, e. g., holding four acres and a half and the sixth part of a half acre, John Gyle one third of half an acre, &c.

3. We have already had occasion to notice the formation of intermixed holdings and open-field customs in the case of settlements and plots gradually developing out of more or less complete isolation. A good many smaller villages and hamlets must have carried on their cultivation of the arable on systems of intermixture of a comparatively small number of elements. But, of course, the so-called open-field system, with its strips scattered about the fields in such a manner as to combine into holdings in regular proportions to each other, finds its home chiefly in villages where it would have been difficult otherwise to allot holdings to the settlers on a regularly graduated scale. The curious intermixture of rights arising from such a system of allotment is sometimes described in the authorities with considerable detail. For instance, in the charter of King Edgar to chamberlain Winstan conferring land at Avon, Wilts, the three hides given are said to be ‘singulis jugeribus mixtum in communi rure huc illucque dispersis loco . . . at Afene’.¹ A charter of Æthelred tells of a plot of common land (communis terrae) at Ceorlatune, granted to the thane Ælfgar with all privileges except the common labour. The said village is not divided by definite boundaries, because the acres lie in intermixture between each other.² In a grant of King Edgar to the thane Ælfric of nine hides ‘at Æþeredingetune’ these nine hides are said to lie in intermixture (on ge mang) with other ‘share-land’ (gedal lande), so that the field pastures are in common, and the meadows in common, and the arable (yrþland) in common.³ Both share-meadows and share-land, in the sense of arable in shares, occur in charters,⁴ and I need hardly recall the famous paragraph of Ine's laws treating of the ceorls who have to keep up the hedges around share-meadows and share-fields.¹ It is only worthy of attention that the paragraph in question regulates the responsibility for negligence in keeping up hedges, not in regard to dependent peasants who would have to take their law from their lord, or possibly from their own moot, but in respect of freemen whose relations had to be adjusted by the King's courts. In view of the widespread customs of open-field cultivation, it was natural enough to insert such an enactment in a collection of the general laws of Wessex. The peculiar conformation of the arable fields under such a system is fully described in treatises on champion farming, and has been sufficiently explained by modern inquirers.² Domesday Survey, of course, does not go down to such details in its general cadastre, and only occasionally affords glimpses of the prevailing system. But profuse material for the nomenclature and practice of open-field husbandry is supplied by the entries of the Old English charters as to boundaries. I will call attention to a few of them. In a charter of 979 we read of a half furlong extending by the right boundary of the land.³ A charter of Edward the Elder (A. D. 903) mentions a gore acre—an acre strip running to a point on account of the lie of the land, instead of running between parallel lines. In the same deed a fore-arth occurs, that is, a strip used for the turning of the plough.¹ In a charter of Edgar of 969 a headland acre is mentioned, a feature of the field arrangement which served the purpose of reaching the strips of a furlong, as it ran at right angles to them. The headlands were also used for the same object as the forearths in ploughing, that is, for turning the plough.² Again, local features connected with the rotation of crops on the furlongs of open fields may be apparent in the way of acres of beanland and barleyland included in a hide.³ Linches, terraces formed on the slope of a hill by ploughing across it, are often mentioned.⁴ The single strips in the open fields, forming as it were the elementary units of the groups or bundles, are not usually spoken of, because they were too minute to be reckoned up in deeds. But occasional mentions may occur nevertheless. The most interesting memorandum about the transactions connected with the restoration of Medhamstead (Peterborough Abbey) speaks in one case of thirty acres lying in sixty 'sticca landes', and I do not think anything else but strips or measured pieces can have been meant.⁵

4. The open-field system finds its direct complement in Holdings. the arrangement of shares and holdings, inasmuch as the complicated intermixture of strips, the cumbersome customs regulating the fences and hedges, the roads, drains, and ditches, the use of headlands and forearths, &c., were primarily called forth by the wish to make the holdings in the village, if not exactly equal, at least corresponding to each other in simple proportions and reduced in their variety to a few fairly equivalent types. I need not return to the much-discussed relations between the hide and carucate as full ploughlands, and their fractional subdivisions—the yardland (virgate) and oxgang (bovate). The origin of these subdivisions and their relation to acres may still be matter of investigation, but their meaning in mediaeval husbandry, during the period covered by Domesday and approximately two centuries before and after, does not admit of doubt. They are units of husbandry formed by the combination of acres lying either together in plots or dispersed as strips in the furlongs of an open-field township. Before approaching these principal agrarian units of which we constantly hear in Domesday, I should like to notice one rather exceptional combination occurring in the Danish provinces. It was more or less stamped out by the more common holdings of the carucate and hide systems, but it has left some traces, and these are characteristic on account of the composition, not merely of this exceptional unit, but also of the holdings of the common types. In the north-east corner of Norfolk, in a fen district bordering on Lincolnshire, we find in the local custom of the manor of Walpole¹ a variation of the system of holdings obtaining everywhere on the island.

In all the cases where holdings are formed of scattered strips of arable with appendant rights to the use of meadows, pasture, and wood, two main features have to be noticed. The holdings are proportionate shares, and the arrangement of the open-field or champion farming is entirely dependent on them. Although the arable is as a rule not subject to redivision, it was originally allotted in consequence of a scheme of equalization; the tenements which are parts of it are termed and considered 'lots', and in case of confusion or encroachment the repartition could be renewed by going back to the original scheme of apportionment indicated by the holdings.¹ Thus it may be said that the English open-field settlements were primarily communities of shareholders whose shares had been apportioned according to certain fixed proportions. The second side of the arrangement consists in the fact that, though there is no legal necessity for keeping the shares undivided and maintaining constant relations between the holdings and the groups of population settled on them, there is a customary tendency, especially among the humbler folk, to keep up as far as possible the organic unity and efficiency of the shares. An important consequence of this tendency may be traced in the constitution of the ordinary subdivisions of the holdings. Excepting Kent, where the ancient subdivision of sulungs into yokes gradually disappears and land tenure is treated in a thoroughly individualistic manner, the shares of the English open-field system correspond to the divisions of the plough-team. Further and more complicated divisions are not impossible, but they are not usual, and in most cases the accidental working of the law of succession and of free alienation was evidently checked by custom.

The arable. 5. The terms used in Domesday and the charters in regard to arable are worth notice. Usually, it is alluded to merely as the central part of the ploughland, carucate, hide, or sulung, and of their subdivisions—the virgates, bovates—while on the other hand the land for ploughs and the reckoning of actual teams remind us that there was a good deal of difference between realities, possibilities, and fiscal estimates, although they would all be expressed in terms derived from agriculture. Sometimes, however, the arable land as such is made the subject of observation and separate description. Even a ‘scrap’ of arable land may be entered specially, and probably it is just as a scrap that it is not merged in the rubrics—carucates, virgates, bovates.¹ In fact, arable land not subjected to ordinary conditions of measurement and fiscal estimation passes, as it were, outside the common frame of holdings. We have already come across many instances where the Survey speaks of land which neither pays geld nor is hidated. It belongs generally to the king or to churches, and it is entered in the cadastre as a certain number of carucates—field carucates in this case—or as so many acres of arable.² The number of such acres may be large, but they are properly reckoned merely as acres, because they do not go to form holdings, and are not connected with the other items of a holding—rights of pasture, of wood usage, &c. In a case reported from Dorset³ William de Ow holds a portion of land which never paid geld in the reign of King Edward, but it was included in the demesne and in the farm of the king. It fell into the hands of a Royal reeve, and remained so during Harold's domination. It used to be pasture, but now it is cultivated for 'seed'. The uncertainty in regard to the quantity of the land and its juridical condition are connected with the fact that the land in question never paid geld—was, as a matter of fact, converted from its original use as pasture into arable, and had been appropriated by a reeve. Altogether, one cannot wonder that the Survey had to content itself in this case with the merest economic description; we do not even hear what peasants there were on the land to cultivate it.

The Saxon expression for terra arabilis was yrðland,¹ and we find it sometimes in distorted forms in the Domesday Survey itself. In fact, the herdwicks, which it is so tempting to identify with pastoral settlements,² seem to have been sometimes agricultural clearings in the waste or in the woods.³ Yrðland appears in any case commonly in the form herðland and herdland,⁴ and is sometimes directly connected with herdwicks and hardwicks. The herdwick would thus be a close counterpart of berwick—barley-wick—denoting the grange and stable of a small manorial settlement.

Assarts.

The struggle to reclaim land for cultivation is also indicated by some allusions to essarts,⁵ assarta (newlands), allusions which seem to come almost too rarely ; but one thing which every investigator of these facts of early agrarian history has constantly to bear in mind is the disproportion between the real significance of phenomena and their appearance in express notations. Facts of everyday occurrence and extreme economic importance are again and again hidden from our view, or disclosed merely in occasional glimpses, by the barren and rigid formulas adopted in the descriptions and narrations which have come down to us. It is not the couple of direct allusions to assarted land that can give us a statistical test of the work of colonization and reclaiming from waste which was going on in England in the eleventh century or before, but it is important to note that in trying to realize the conditions and stages of this work we have to look not only to the few scanty notices of newly-reclaimed land but also to other indications. And on closer examination of the very mentions of terra arabilis with which we are dealing now we find that they are indissolubly connected with another group of notices which meets us at every step in the Survey, and throws light, if not on the actual spread of colonization, at least on its direction and aims.

It turns out, in fact, that terra arabilis is sometimes distinctly used to denote the area not only of actual but also of possible cultivation, a use which agrees well with the literal sense of the term. In Norfolk, for instance, we find a large tract entered as the King's land in Thetford, on the other side of the Ouse. It is one league long and half a league broad, and there are three persons who share in its income—the King, the earl, and the sheriff, each for one-third. Another part of the same tract of Thetford lies towards Suffolk, and is half a league in length and half a league in breadth. One-third share of it belongs to the earl, and, presumably, two-thirds to the King. Now of the first portion one half is said to be arable and the other half pasture, while in the Suffolk portion all the land is arable, and it could be ploughed by four teams.¹ This is a most interesting entry. The tract in question, though entered under the rubric of royal land, and as a royal manor, is clearly a district subjected to the King, earl, and sheriff as public powers, and not to the King as a private landlord. The passage from sovereignty to feudal landlordism is well illustrated by it. On the other hand, the arable, which forms so large a portion of the district, is clearly not taken as the aggregate of the holdings, but in the same sense as pasture—it is land fit to be cultivated for seed. Therefore its capacity may be expressed not only in leagues, but also in the number of ploughs which might be there or might till it. It is the prospect of cultivation more than the fact of its being to a certain extent cultivated that is insisted on. The passage may also serve to establish once more the interpretation for which I have been contending when I had to explain the terra carucis term; it has nothing to do with the occupation of the reign of King Edward, and is plainly directed to giving an estimate of the land fit for agriculture. Nor is this passage by any means an isolated one. Similar entries occur in Lincolnshire.² Indeed in the latter county the expression terra arabilis ad xii carucas,³ and similar ones, sometimes take the place of the usual terra carucarum, terra carucis, terra ad carucas, &c.

holdings¹ was the use of the meadows, if there were such. The quantity of this kind of land mentioned in Domesday is not large, and we know from other sources that the greatest care was taken to prevent encroachments in this respect. The practice of dividing meadows into strips, and of assigning these strips in rotation or by lot to the members of the ancient township community, has even now not quite disappeared from rural England. A few miles from Oxford, the Yarnton meadows are still distributed according to immemorial custom,² reminding one of analogous practices employed in the case of Aston and Cote.³ The advantages of possessing meadows yielding a rich harvest of hay were keenly realized by the farmers at all periods, but it is very seldom that we find in Domesday meadows estimated to cover by their yield the entire requirements of the domain and of the tenants for the feeding of horses and oxen.⁴ Even more rare are cases where a good deal of the hay could be sold after the needs of the manor itself had been satisfied.⁵ Usually, even in large estates, only a few acres of meadow are mentioned. What value was set on these may be gathered from a case in Kent, in which a whole yoke, the land of four oxen, was deemed to find its equivalent in two acres of meadow yielding 10s. a year.⁶ Another instance from the same county is less clear. In the huge royal manor of Tarentefort, containing land for forty ploughs, and as many as 142 villain tenements with 53 teams, there is as much meadow as appertains to ten acres of land, while another meadow and twenty acres of land have been appropriated by somebody.¹ The expression 'appertains to 10 acres' is very unusual, and in the case of the subtracted meadow the twenty acres appear as a direct estimate of what was lost. But even assuming that the total amount of meadow land were thirty acres, it would appear exceedingly small when compared with the enormous extent of the holdings in arable and their stock in teams. There was indeed a good deal of wood pasture, but still the disproportion would remain, and the term 'pertinet' makes me think that the acrae terrae are, as in the case of the yoke just quoted, fiscal units. Now the taxation of Tarentefort in sulungs was preposterously low—only $1\frac{1}{2}$ sulungs for the whole, that is, probably 300 fiscal acres. Of these, thirty fiscal acres of meadow would form one-tenth, which seems appropriate and reasonable.

Pasture.

Most of the food for the cattle was provided in those times by wild pasture, and Domesday gives abundant information in most counties in regard to its extent and economic importance. I will just mention a few of the most salient features of these entries. It is obvious that in many cases actual arable land was used for pasture. Apart from the regular customs of stocking the field commons, about which a few words will have to be said later on, arable reverted to pasture by its falling waste or being encroached upon by a powerful neighbour.² But in most cases the pastoral land of the township was carefully separated from its arable, and there must have been definite customary views in the selection of both. Separate pasture, pastura separalis, occurs, but is not very usual. The most ordinary form of pasture is the stocking of the commons, which are not unfrequently recorded as the common pasture of a township or a manor,¹ or pasture-rights in one place appertaining to the inhabitants of another.² An interesting entry occurs in the Somerset manor of Haminton. It gelds for 21 hides, and out of these one is added on account of the common pasture³—a very strong case of artificial fiscal hidation, as pasture land never formed actual field-hides by itself. The commons of pasture might occasionally stretch over enormous districts, as has been shown, for instance, in the case of the seashore pastures of Essex, to which far distant townships had ways of access.⁴ Nor was it impossible or uncommon to attribute common pastures to a whole hundred, the beasts of which were left to depasture the commons 'horn under horn'.⁵ The fens and marshes offered similar opportunities for very extended and communal rights of pasture.⁶ It is curious that in Romney Marsh the attention of the surveyors was almost exclusively directed towards the estimate of arable, surely not because there were no pasture-rights to speak of, but because these rights did not seem to admit of definite expression.⁷

Rights of pasture occur also as one of the chief sources Woods. of income from woods. The breeding of swine especially, the animal whose flesh was used most for food in the course of the middle ages, depended to a great extent in England on the produce ('mast') of oak, beech, chestnut, and other glandiferous trees. But goats and horned cattle had also very often to resort to wood-pasture. The useless wood was rather an exception,¹ and the exploitation referred to would be quite as much the pasturing of animals as the use of the wood for building, making hedges, carpentering, &c. Small wood, silva minuta,² would be very valuable from the first point of view. Therefore the wood was sometimes entered in the Survey in conjunction with pasture,³ and the way of estimating its value is very often to indicate the number of swine which might get their food in it.⁴ Another mode of appreciation based on the same feature—the nutritive capacity of the wood—was to specify how many animals were rendered in dues for the use of the pannage:⁵ this seems the most appropriate explanation for otherwise odd expressions, such as ‘wood for two pigs’.⁶ It is hardly needful to remind the reader of the immense extent of territory covered by woods; although the exact boundaries and quantity may be sometimes difficult to ascertain with certitude, there cannot be any doubt as to the general aspect of such tracts as the weald of Kent, the southern hundreds of Surrey, the forest of Rockingham, &c.⁷ When these woods are not turned into Royal forests they are mostly in the common use of the demesne and tenantry of a manor,⁸ or, if large, of a number of manors, perhaps of a whole county.¹ The 'admensuration' of the rights of usage in woods is effected in different manners, and there is even a greater variety in the expressions used by our documents to describe them. A good example of an explicit declaration in this respect, from the Domesday Survey, is afforded by an entry about Newenton, a Wiltshire manor of the Abbey of Wilton. This manor is said to have the customary right to 80 cartloads of wood, pannage for 80 pigs, and the material for the repair of houses and hedges from the wood of Melchet.² Old English charters often give similar information as to the number of cartloads, and the pasture for pigs.³ In the great Royal wood of Havocumber, Dorset, Earl Godwin had a right to the third oak;⁴ the appropriation of these valuable trees could not be left to chance, but had to be strictly regulated. As in the case of pasture, the right to the wood was necessarily proportionate to the size of the holding, being in fact a part of the share in the common concerns of the township.⁵

Two terms and peculiarities of wood-custom remain to be noticed—the denes and the hays or hedges. A dene is a clearance in the thicket in which men and animals may move with some ease: such pasturage grounds within the wood were especially numbered and guarded, and mostly contained a few huts for the keepers and herdsmen.⁶ When a dene of half a yoke is mentioned in Kent, it means probably that the use of grass allowed to particular tenants was proportioned to the half yoke attributed to them.¹ The haiae indicate another aspect of forest-life which was certainly not the least important one—the woods were mainly hunting grounds, and had to be preserved as such. In order to keep game and deer the ordinary device was to enclose the hunting ground by permanent hedges;² besides these, temporary hedges were raised during the hunting seasons for drives (stabilituræ).³ The enclosed tract itself received the name of haia,⁴ from the fact of its being within hedges. Besides their value as parks for game the haiae must have served also for other purposes of wood exploitation. A share in a 'hay' might thus become a very valuable husbandry item.⁵ It would be out of the question to dwell here on the history of Royal forests. I will only call attention to a few passages of the Survey showing the rapid and violent extension of forest rights in consequence of the Conquest, and the destructive influence exercised by the spread of forests and forest jurisdiction on the population at large.¹ Various other economic commodities mentioned in the Domesday Survey, such as mills, quarries,² orchards, vineyards,³ &c., are by their very nature mostly held in severalty and not as appendant to holdings. In regard to saltworks⁴ and fisheries,⁵ both might be the case, but the Survey mostly tells us of cases of individual appropriation, probably because they came more within the purview of exact estimates. Before leaving the subject of appendant rights, I will again call attention to a fact which must hamper all attempts at general statistics in regard to these rights. Pastures and woods are by no means always noticed in the descriptions. In most instances, perhaps, more or less explicit entries were made, but there are counties where wild pasture was nearly disregarded.¹ Negatively, this is an important fact, as it ought to check calculations tending to estimate the contrast between the agriculture of Domesday and pastoral or forest pursuits.²

Waste.

7. One of the reasons for the uncertainty of many descriptions in the Survey is the enormous amount of waste, in the sense of devastated land. On the borders of Wales, for instance, in Herefordshire, there were nine manors of 19 hides entirely laid waste. In eleven other manors there was land for 36 ploughs, but it was and had been waste, and had never paid geld.³ The estimate of the terra carucis ought to be noted, as it establishes again, in a most conclusive manner, what I have been trying to make out as the meaning of the ploughlands of the Survey; the terra carucis or terra carucarum applies not to land under actual cultivation, and not to that which had been under cultivation in the reign of King Edward, but to the land considered fit for agriculture. In fact, in the reign of King Edward the land was already lying waste. In the same way we find in Cheshire a large tract of 16 potential ploughlands, formerly held by eight freemen, lying waste from the time before the Conquest.⁴ Yorkshire was, of course, one of the counties most terribly harried, both by Harold and by William the Conqueror, and on every page of its survey we find records of devastation—in fact, many of these pages present hardly anything else. I will just refer, as an example, to the description of Agemundenesse. Of the enormous soke centring around Earl Tosti's manor of Preston,¹ and containing sixty-one villages, only 16 acres were still cultivated, but even as to these it was not known exactly who their inhabitants were. All the rest was waste. Again, Whitby² used to be a flourishing estate of Earl Siward, with 15 carucates and land for 15 more ploughlands; it was valued in the reign of King Edward at £42 yearly income. T. R. W. the tract with its three leagues by two of open fields, and seven by three of wood, was tenanted by William Percy, under Earl Hugh of Chester, with two teams in demesne, and one team among ten villains and three bordarii. The value was £3. The soke of the manor was in as desolate a condition as the manor itself. It was estimated for the geld at 28 carucates, and there was room for 22 ploughlands more, and yet there were only 6 teams in two of the townships, and a population of 8 socmen households, and 30 villain holdings. Staffordshire³ and Northamptonshire⁴, though not so thoroughly devastated, show everywhere traces of the great ravages incurred during the struggles of the eleventh century. On the other hand, such instances as Bishopestrev in Cheshire, an estate that had passed from Earl Edwin to the Earl of Chester, where one manor and two half-manors are estimated to contain land for one plough, two serfs, and one bordarius, may be due to the fact that the place was in a state of almost complete wilderness, due not to devastation, but to the lack of capital and labour. The insignificance of the one ploughland assigned to the manor seems to point this way.⁵ The opposition to waste is settlement (vastum: hospitatum). The mere fact that untenanted land rendered some income to stray occupiers,¹ or could be utilized for pasture,² or for hunting,³ did not much change its condition. It is only through permanent colonization that it passes from the category of waste to that of terrae hospitatae.⁴ The Saxon equivalent of terra hospitata would be gesett land, and generally gewerod is added to this qualification of settled land, to show that it was not only held by permanent tenants, but also rendered dues to the king or 'defended' itself in regard to him, as the expression went.⁵ The policy of providing the land with tenants for tillage, and to enable it to bear the burden of taxes and public services was one of the chief concerns of Old English Royalty, and one of the motives making for feudalization and the rise of aristocracy. The landrica or landlord had to help materially with the outfit and protection if waste districts were to be 'hospitated' and enabled to take up the 'wara'.⁶ Therefore every period of economic and social restoration, following on great devastation, was at the same time a period of advantage for the growth of aristocracy. This is told in as many words in the history of colonizing ecclesiastical institutions, which created an aristocracy of privileged corporations if not of individuals. But the same process may be traced in Ine's legislation¹ during the rise of Wessex, in some of the later Anglo-Saxon books during the struggle with the Danes,² and in Domesday itself in the efforts of the great ecclesiastical houses to gather tenants in order to improve the dilapidated condition of the ancient estates that had fallen into their hands.³

Before leaving the subject, let us glance at the different causes producing devastation in those times; there is such a multiplicity of them that one can easily realize what a hard stand the constructive and reconstructive tendencies had against the constant threat of devastation. We have already seen what the Celts of Wales could do in that direction, and what aspect the March of Wales showed in some parts. In Devonshire we come across terrible ravages committed by Irish pirates.⁴ But the host of the king himself could be responsible for similar desolation.⁵ The building of castles, which went on uninterruptedly from the Conquest through the greater part of the twelfth century, and was only temporarily checked by Henry Plantagenet, was another source of destruction to the adjoining population.⁶ Of the forests we have already had occasion to speak; they were a curse, both directly and indirectly, as a surrender of the rights of men to the comfort of beasts and plants,⁷ and as a vantage ground from which privileged animals carried out their inroads against the cultivated districts. But besides these most tragic eventualities there was the constant wear and tear of life, badly provided for and badly protected, in its struggle for existence. Let us listen to the simple but eloquent words of the description of Lincoln: 'Of these waste houses there were destroyed for the sake of the castle one hundred and sixty-six; the rest, seventy-four, were laid waste outside the boundaries of the castle—not on account of the oppression of sheriffs and bailiffs, but because of disasters, poverty, and fires.'¹ Although the direct responsibility of officials is set aside in this case, it is clear that it was generally a standing cause of oppression and destruction. Their pernicious influence is clearly affirmed in the case of Norwich; of the burgesses who lived in the Borough of Norwich 'twenty-two left, and stayed in Beccles, a village belonging to the Abbot of St. Edmund's. Those who fled, and others who remain, are entirely ruined (vastatae), partly through the forfeiture of Earl R., partly through fires, partly by the King's geld, and partly by Waleran (the sheriff).'² A significant story of oppression by the local lord is told from Cambas in Suffolk. There were in this place 62 freemen originally commended to Ulnott, a thane of King Edward, then under the patronage of Earl Brian, the predecessor of Earl Robert, while the soke over them remained in the hands of the King. Their number dwindled under King William and the rule of Earl Robert to 50, and instead of 16 teams T.R.E. they held only 8 between them. The whole manor of Cambas had increased in its yield from £10 to £16, but was hardly able to bear the burden. As for the 50 freemen, their worth was not more than £16, but the landlord was getting from them by extortion £31, notwithstanding the decrease of their numbers and means, and they were unable to bear it without 'confusion'.³ Here the negative, extortionary side of landlordism makes itself manifestly felt and, of course, it is necessary to take both into account in order to draw an estimate of the effects of the rise of aristocracy. It sounds like a paradox, but both lines of action on the part of the mighty led to their historical success; they grew strong by protection and by oppression, as capitalists and patrons, as well as tyrants and destroyers. They began to lose ground again as soon as a certain equilibrium of political forces was reached in the arrangement of society, and the constructive power of labour began to make itself felt behind the screen of feudal privileges.

8. Does the Domesday Survey ever mention real measures Measurements. in distinction to fiscal units, estimates of ploughlands, and reckonings of normal plough-teams? As a rule, the numbers given in holdings or acres are primarily meant as geld numbers, but there are cases when this may be questioned. Take, for instance, the following Devonshire statement about 'Leuge'.¹ Alsi held it T. R. E., and paid geld for 3 virgates. There is land for 8 ploughs. There are 2 teams and 2 serfs in demesne, and 10 villains, 5 bordarii, and 2 cotters have 4 teams. There are 10 acres of meadow and 30 of pasture, and one virgate of wood. The same Norman and Saxon owners (Godobold and Alsi) had held in turn Leveleghe, which paid geld T. R. E. for one virgate. There is land for 4 ploughs. There are $2\frac{1}{2}$ ploughs and 2 serfs, 2 villains and 4 bordarii; 2 acres of meadow and 20 acres of pasture, and one ferling of small wood. If we take acres, virgates, and ferlings to be geld measures in every case, it is difficult to account for the fact that, in the first case one-third of the total tax, and in the second one-quarter, is laid on the wood—one virgate out of three in Leghe, and one ferling out of four in Leveleghe. Besides, if the acres are added to the tax of the woods, 40 acres in the first instance and 22 in the second, we get considerably over the supposed number of acres in Leghe according to the 48 acres standard ($40 + 22 = 62$); while there should be only 36 acres in the 3 virgates. Even taking the 120 acres, we reach 70 acres for wood and pasture out of a possible 90, and there would only remain 20 for the arable. In the second instance the reckoning is even more embarrassing. According to the 48 acres standard to which the mention of ferlings seems to point, 26 acres would be required for wood, meadow, and pasture, while there are only 12 to dispose of. On the 120 acres standard we should reach $29\frac{1}{2}$ acres for wood, meadow, and pasture out of 32, and there would be still all the arable to account for. All this would be absurd, and we are driven to take the acres in the sense of real and not fiscal measurements in these and similar cases, while the virgates and ferlings for the wood seem still to stand for fiscal quantities, as it would be very unlikely that such a small quantity as $7\frac{1}{2}$ acres of wood, not to speak of 3 acres, should be described as a ferling, and entered in addition to a good deal of arable and pasture, especially in Devonshire, one of the counties which possessed the largest tracts of uncultivated land and woods. But what are we to say of cases when we hear of so many acres inter silvam et planum, as we occasionally do in Suffolk¹ and other shires? It seems to me that the elaborate description of acres in this manner leaves hardly any doubt as to their reality. The inter silvam et planum is, after all, the translation of the time-honoured 'be wode and be felde', even the peculiar sequence of the two constitutive elements being preserved. A similar argument to that employed in the Devonshire case just quoted may be appealed to in favour of such an interpretation, when we find, as in Estone, Beds, that only half a hide to the geld is assigned to a manor, while at the same time 60 acres inter silvam et planum are claimed out of the entire estate.² These 60 acres would simply swallow up the whole half-hide if geld units were meant in both cases, and it seems evident that the adjunct of the 'wood and field' qualification stamps the latter number as that of field acres in contrast to the earlier geld entry. And, again, when acrae stands by itself, without further addition, it mostly points to geld units.

² Dd. i. 210 b: (Easton, Hunts) 'In Estone tenet Willelmus de Caron dimidiam hidam et dimidiam uirgatam de episcopo (Lincolniense). Terra est i carucae. . . . In hac terra episcopatus reclamat Willelmus de Caron lx acras inter planum et siluam.'

The liberi homines and socmen of Danish districts are throughout rated in acres, more seldom in virgates, bovates, hides, and carucates. In all these cases one has primarily to think of geld units, or rather of wara assessment establishing the proportion represented by the tenants in question in the scot and lot of the hundred. This may look intricate at first, but, after all, it is the direct consequence of the swerving of the wara, the schedule rate, from natural and local measurement, and the cases examined are certainly not more intricate than the Middlesex one. Hitherto I have dealt with the estimates of quantity expressed in agrarian holdings and measures, but there is another way of indicating quantity and extent which is in frequent use in the East Anglian and some other shires, namely, the reckoning in leagues, quarantenes, perches, &c. It is comprised under the general term mensura, and the measurement of a place may be used to estimate territory¹ or boundaries.² The measurement of wide tracts of wood and pasture by leagues seems especially appropriate, as these tracts could not be included in the ordinary agrarian units, but were only appendant to them.³ But the plain or open could also be made the object of such measurement.⁴ Even more frequently a whole township, or estate, or even a hundred, might be described as being so many leagues in length and so many in width.⁵ In most cases the numbers given are rough—one league, half a league, one quarantene, &c.—but instances are not wanting when the numbers are calculated to a nicety.¹

Now what was the meaning of such measurements, and how were they used in practice? The territory of England was, after all, nowhere divided into regular squares like those formed sometimes on the chessboard of North America. The shapes formed by the boundaries of shires, hundreds, townships, and estates were very irregular, and sometimes consisted of several bits patched together. Besides, what is quite natural in the division of vacant soil of approximately uniform quality seems very strange in the case of a country of ancient and very uneven culture, in which the concentration of inhabitants and the appropriation of capital meant a good deal more than square leagues. However, there are the measurements, and, as we have seen, they were sometimes made with a pretension to exactness.

It is difficult to make out whether the woods, estates, and hundreds were measured along their belts of greatest length and width, or on perpendiculars drawn in some way across their main body—perhaps on the meridian and parallel of the place; measurements, in well-authenticated cases, of parishes preserving their ancient boundaries may serve some day to clear up the question.² But it seems to me that, in any case, the aim of this kind of measurement must have been to provide an approximate basis for the claims of estates and townships in a country where boundaries were still difficult to determine. Of course, most of the Old English grants of land were accompanied by careful indications of boundaries, but our grants belong, after all, almost exclusively to privileged land, and their boundaries do not comprise the wide tracts of adjoining woods and commons. At a time when most settlements were surrounded by a kind of natural wilderness, somewhat resembling the natural wildernesses said to have been created by German tribes along their frontiers, the best device for a distribution of rights was to assign to every one the extent of his power in length and width, without pretending to draw a complete circle around him. If this process came into use with early systems of regularizing the settlements, it was sure to endure for a long while after more exact boundaries were drawn in some cases or even in most.

The principal results of the section on Land Tenure may Results. be summarized in the following points:—

1. The Norman Conquest led to a complete revision and modification of the land-law of preconquestual times, by making the feudal nexus general and obligatory.

2. Yet the compilers of Domesday Book had to take heed of some flagrant discrepancies in the treatment of land tenure in Anglo-Saxon times. The notices as to alod and as to parage were produced by the wish to take stock of some striking peculiarities of preconquestual land-law, in terms derived from French usage.

3. In the important question of succession, the generalizing tendency of feudal law must not conceal the fact that the main types of succession—joint holdings, division among heirs, unification of estates—are in process of development before the Conquest, and that the motives for these forms of development are supplied by considerations of economic efficiency as well as by requirements of service.

4. Collective ownership is clearly indicated in the Old English evidence. It is apt to be combined with overlordships, which after the Conquest assume more and more the aspect of ownership or private tenure.

5. The size and distribution of settlements depended not only on racial habits, but on a variety of geographical causes as well as on the conditions of colonization. The prevailing type of settlement in the greater part of England was the village, but single farms and hamlets are to be found everywhere by the side of it.

6. In connexion with the modes of settlement both compact holdings and open-field intermixture of holdings occur, but the latter appears as the most common system of cultivation and tenure. There are many intermediate stages between both systems.

7. Practices of champion farming, which occur in modern open-field husbandry up to the time of enclosures, may be clearly traced in all their principal features back to early Anglo-Saxon evidence.

8. The open-field arrangements are intimately connected with a distribution of the land into holdings, and the prevailing agrarian husbandry depends entirely on the apportionment of rights and interests according to the proportionate shares of the holdings. On the other hand, there is a tendency, both among the free and the servile population, to keep up as much as possible the efficiency of the holdings as far as it depends on the organic formation of the plough-team and its natural fractions.

9. The growth of landed aristocracy is partly to be explained by the influence of capital and of patronage in times of severe social struggle and recurring devastation.

SECTION II: RURAL ORGANIZATION

CHAPTER I

I. THE term manor and the M. serving to abbreviate it meet the eye of the Domesday inquirer at every moment, and it is especially important to grasp its exact meaning or varieties of meaning. To begin with, the expression is clearly used in the sense of the mansion, the residence of a more or less exalted personage. One might appeal, to substantiate this meaning, not only to the undoubted derivation from manere through the medium of the French manoir, but also to the equivalent employed by the Exon Domesday—mansio, instead of manerium. But the more common, and, one may say, the prevalent meaning, is that of an estate or district, of which the central house is the hall (aula). The general correspondence with estates is sufficiently clear in the frequent cases when the colourless terra, in the sense of a complex of land, is used as an equivalent to Manerium. Thus to the ‘Mansion’ of Middelton in Devon, two other ‘mansions’ are added according to the Exon Domesday—Lega and Littleton, and these very manors are described in the Exchequer Domesday as terrae, estates.¹ This would be in keeping with other cases where terra is used in an entirely neutral sense as a tract of land.² But the terms may be opposed to each other with the evident object of drawing more precise distinctions. The manor of Lindene in Gloucestershire is said to have been formed by William de Ow out of four terrae; and in the same way two originally independent estates called terrae are said to have become merged in the Kentish manor of Eisse, belonging to Hugh, a tenant of the Bishop of Bayeux.¹ The point is, that small estates have been subjected to the administration of a large one, and are regarded merely as pertinent to a manor and not as manors themselves. Whether they were ever considered as such before it is impossible to say. In other instances, estates (terrae) rated separately to the geld are said to belong to some big manor, Tewkesbury, for instance.² Or else a piece of land may be said to appertain to several manors; a remark which can hardly be accounted for on any other ground but that the owners had held the land in question in joint ownership.³ In a few cases the terra, being taken as a special term, is represented by a T. in the margin instead of the usual *M.*⁴ A good case of an attempted distinction between manor, as a definite unit of ownership and administration, and terra as an indefinite quantity of land, is presented by the Survey description of Driteham. There were in this place $1\frac{1}{2}$ hides which Alfric held of King Edward as one manor, and afterwards he gave this land to his wife and his daughter at the church of Chertsey, as the men of the hundred testify. This declaration is challenged by Richard, son of Gislebert, the holder in the reign of King William. It does not lie in any manor, and he does not hold it as a manor, but it had been delivered to him. In this 'land of Alfric' there was one carucate in demesne and 2 bordarii and 2 scrfs.¹ The fact that the land in question stood outside any manor makes it probable that the verdict of the hundred was perfectly right, and that the little estate of Alfric had been bequeathed to Chertsey after the extinction of the life-interest of Alfric's widow and daughter, who very likely had taken refuge there. Anyhow, we have to note the endeavour to oppose the manor as an organized unit with an administrative centre to a piece of land without a particular organization. This is not the only way in which the terms are used, but it is a characteristic one.

A 'terra', a small estate, might commonly become a mere tenement dependent on the higher unit of the manor. Such is the case with a small holding of 1½ virgates owned by Ralf de l'Isle. It lies in the Royal manor of Biggleswade, in Bedfordshire, and is estimated there, and the Saxon owner of it could neither give nor sell his land without leave of the owner of Bicheleswade.² Manors occur of the most diverse size, from plots of land rated at one virgate, or 40 acres, to enormous organizations like Taunton or Leominster, containing villages by the score, and hundreds of dependent holdings. This by itself would not be strange by any means, as the measure of an economic organization, of an estate, is after all only its capacity of being ruled from one centre. But curiously enough there are many indications of a tendency to treat the manor as a unit, and to estimate this unit as a definite quantity. To begin with, we constantly hear of people holding land pro manerio, or even pro uno manerio,¹ and this seems to imply that any given quantity would not make up a manor. Still it might be said, if the instances we are speaking of stood isolated, that the adjunction of the words pro manerio does not mean much more than the word manerium itself or an M. in the margin, namely, that a certain described quantity of land was organized as a compact estate, with its separate administration, its distinct income, and distinct accounts. But then we find in Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire, counties with a strong admixture of Danes, curious attempts to count up manors in order to settle the amount of reliefs.² A thane holding 6 manors or less is said to be bound by custom to pay 3 marks, that is £2, as a relief, on entering on possession, while a thane having more than 6 manors would be taxed for relief at £8. The notice is interesting and puzzling in many respects. It comes from a Danish district, it applies to customs which obtained in the time before the Conquest, and therefore speaks of thanes, and still it uses the Norman expression relief, perhaps inaccurately for heriot. The sums mentioned do not correspond to any of the later standards of relief, neither to the £5 of the knight, nor to the 100*l.* or 100 marks of the baron. And lastly, how could manors be counted up by half-dozens? In what sense did the half-dozen form a convenient division for so sharp a contrast as that between men paying £8 and people paying only £2 to obtain the right to succession? The reckoning by dozens is by itself characteristic of the Danish region, but the oddity of drawing a clear line between possessors of six manors and possessors of seven or more is not lessened by the consideration, nor does it explain in what way a manor could be equated to another in order to form the required estimates. A similar difficulty occurs in the survey of Essex, where it is supposed for some reason that Eustache de Boulogne had a right to a round hundred of manors, and measures were taken to fill up this hundred.¹ Here the instance would date from after the Conquest, but there occurs the same idea of a counting up of manors as fairly equivalent units. A batch of Norfolk cases seems to give a clue to these curious reckonings of manor units. In a large number of instances land and tenants are added to certain central estates 'to make up a manor' ad perficiendum manerium.² The use of 'perficiendum' is not singular: it occurs in relation to the making up of a hundred, where there cannot be any doubt that the completion of the exact number was meant.³ Fortunately, we are told expressly in a few cases what standard the manor had to reach in order to be complete. William de Warenne had a number of plots of land and of rights in regard to freemen in Thorp, Mulleslee, Trunchet, &c., to the aggregate of 2 carucates and 352 acres to the geld, or a little less than 5 carucates. And 'all this land was delivered to William for one manor of 5 carucates of land'.⁴ But the same William de

⁴ Dd. ii. 171: (Norfolk) 'In Torp—Muleslai—Trunchet—Repes—Norrepes—Sistran—Sutrepes et Norhrepes [altogether 2 carucatas 352 acras] . . . Haec tota terra fuit liberata Willelmo pro i manerio v carucatarum terrae.'

Warennne received a series of plots and tenants in Sistrow, Kernapat, for one manor of 4 carucates.¹ There the manor units were not identical in the two cases, but they were very much alike, and could be easily used for the purpose of drawing rough averages. If we follow this clue we shall find that in Norfolk at any rate there was certainly a policy tending to form estates called manors, of the size of some 4 or 5 carucates. The making up of Laringset, a manor of Walter Giffard, is well in point. If we count up the portions of carucates and the acres assigned to the freemen engulfed by the estate of Laringset in order to make up a manor, we come to $2\frac{1}{2}$ carucates + 180 acres, that is, exactly 4 carucates.² There is another clue leading to a standard, which is expressed in an estimate of income. The normal manor was assumed to be worth £10 a year. This would mean roughly £2 per carucate, if we take the 5 carucates unit, and £2 10s. if we take that of the 4 carucates. Such an estimate is high, but by no means uncommon in the case of East Anglia. It would not apply in other counties, however, as in most instances £1 per hide or carucate seems to be more nearly adequate.

These considerations show that there can be no talk of the adoption of a uniform standard in this respect all over England, but the facts adduced are nevertheless most significant. They show a set policy pursued before the Conquest, and tending to substitute estates of 4 or 5 hides held by thanes for a quantity of small freehold tenements. Such a policy could be pursued, shortly before the Conquest,

² Dd. ii. 242: (Letheringsett, Norfolk) 'In Leringaseta tenuit Oslacus liber homo t.r.e. i carucatam terrae . . . In Baiafelda xl acras terrae . . . In Glamforda xxx acras terrae . . . only in East Anglia, and in the Danelaw, because only there did the material for the delivery of freemen to make up manors still exist. Would it be too bold to guess that the same process had taken place a good while earlier in the south, and that its landmarks are the numberless grants of manentes, cassati, and tributarii collected in the Codex Diplomaticus and in the Cartularium Saxonicum? However this may be, we have to take note of the view that a normal manor in Norfolk, and perhaps in the east of England, ought to consist of about 4 or 5 carucates, and to give roughly £10 income; a standard which forcibly reminds us of the 5-hide unit repeatedly mentioned in A.-S. Law, and, on the other hand, of some of the knight-fee estimates, and of the lesser fee of £10 income corresponding to the minor standard of equipment in Henry II's assize of arms. Lastly, these attempts show that at the time of the Domesday Inquest, at any rate, the expression 'Manor' was currently used to designate estates organized under aristocratic administration—under knights, or the ecclesiastical corporations which may be substituted for them.

2. Actual manors, as they appear in Domesday, do not often conform to these averages, and present a variety of different types which must be examined separately if we want to form an opinion as to the character and origins of manorial institutions. They may be arranged very roughly in the following five classes, with a good many subdivisions and intermediate shades between them. The grouping would be somewhat as follows: the manor as a capitalistic organization, an economic centre surrounded by peasant-holdings supporting it; the manor as an administrative centre of scattered and more or less independent settlements; the soke, a centre of jurisdictional and tributary organization; Royal manors; small estates exploited directly either by their masters or by rustics.

Medium-sized manors of some 4-10 carucates, with a domanial centre, are the most common variety of Domesday estates, and it is hardly necessary to quote instances in illustration. I will refer to a couple of cases, however. The manor of Segenehou,¹ in Bedfordshire, was held by Walter, brother of Seiher. It paid geld for 10 hides, and had land for 10 ploughs. Four hides were reckoned to the demesne, and there was one team on the home-farm though there could be two more. The tenants actually occupied the rest of the arable with seven teams. There were 24 villain households, 4 bordarii households, and 3 serfs. In the time of King Edward there had been a socman with half a hide in Segenehou who could go where he pleased. He had disappeared among the peasantry at the time of King William. The value of the manor had gone down from £16 to £6 a year, and it is difficult to account for such a fall on the strength of the Domesday description, which shows only a deficit of two ploughs on the demesne land. Apart from the puzzling fall in value the case is a very normal one, the number of hides being exactly equal to that of the ploughlands and of the possible teams, while there is only a certain falling-off as regards the actual teams in the demesne. The extra hide put on the demesne represents probably the extra value conferred on it by the labour of the peasantry, the 'consuetudines villae'. This additional labour cannot have been very excessive, however, as there remained still 6 hides to be defended by the land of the tenants with its seven teams.

The case of Hallingbury,² an Essex manor of Roger de Otburville, may be taken as a specimen of more intricate combinations. It paid geld for only 3 hides and 38 acres, and yet the two freemen who held it T.R.W. had land for $16\frac{1}{2}$ ploughs, of which six were on the demesne and $10\frac{1}{2}$ in the hands of villains. The manor had suffered greatly from the Conquest: there remained only three teams on the demesne instead of six, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ with the peasantry instead of $10\frac{1}{2}$, and of 18 villain households only eight were left. There was wood for 600 pigs, 25 acres of meadow, a pasture yielding 18*d.* in pasnage, and a mill. Nine ploughs could be restored out of the missing eleven. It appears from the further description that in the reign of King Edward there were two manors in Hallingbury, although it is said first to have been held as one. The larger of the two manors was worth £8, and the smaller £3. Their values had gone down T. R. W. to £4 and £2. Some points of this description are not entirely clear. There must have been some close connexion between the two 'freemen' who owned the combined manors T. R. E. Perhaps the more considerable one represented the other in regard to public requirements, and therefore the two estates were deemed one manor in one sense and two in another. The relation between the home-farm and the tenants' portion is more evenly matched than in the Segenchou case, but one does not see why out of the eleven ploughlands which were left untilled only nine could be restored. It seems as if the original repartition of teams implied a case of overstocking. It is worth notice that the tenantry are entered under one head, while the value is reckoned separately for each of the two manors.

These are minor points, however, and the main character of the estates or estate is clearly one of intimate collaboration between home-farm and the peasant part, without any great predominance of one over the other.

Sometimes the concentration of work and capital leads to much larger formations. Let us take, for example, the case of the Herefordshire manor of Leominster.¹ It had been in the hands of Queen Edith, and consisted of 16 'membra'. It was estimated to the geld at 80 hides, and there were 30 plough-teams in its demesne land. The administrative staff consisted of 8 reeves, 8 beadles, and 8 rodknights (radchenisiri), while the peasant population comprised 238 villains, 75 bordarii, and 82 serfs and female slaves (ancillae). The peasants held 230 teams between them. The villains rendered in customary payment £11 5s. 2d., and the riding men 14s. 4d., and

3 sesters of honey. The villains also ploughed and sowed with their own seed 140 acres. The numbers were somewhat altered T. R. W. The King held the manor in his hand, and 60 hides were reckoned for the demesne, in which there were 29 teams, only one less than before. The staff consisted of 6 priests, 6 riding-men, 7 reeves, and 7 beadles, while the villains were 224, the bordarii had increased to 81, the serfs, male and female, diminished in number to 25. The rustics had 201 teams between them, and ploughed and sowed 125 acres for the lord. This description is exceptionally detailed, inasmuch as it mentions not only the numbers of teams and households, but goes the length of stating what the peasants tilled as gafolerth, and how much they paid as customary rent. But, of course, the services and payments in question were not the only duties which lay on the dependent population. Their ordinary week-work is not mentioned separately, but must have been very considerable, if one takes into account the number of peasant teams and holdings, and the heavy proportion of the home-farm in regard to the geld. As many as 60 hides are assigned to the demesne, out of 80, and as the Survey is exceedingly careful in such matters, it seems that there is hardly any other explanation for such a repartition but the considerable amount of work performed by the villains for the lord, by the side of the already large stock represented by his private teams. A similar instance would have been presented by the manor of Ledbury,¹ belonging to the Bishop of Hereford, if the estate had not been greatly devastated. It was rated to the geld at 53 hides, of which 32½ were waste at the time of the Survey. There were only four teams in demesne, 38 villains with 4 bordarii, and 8 riding-men with 28 bordarii, holding altogether 23 plough-teams. There was a wood where 160 pigs could fatten. The value had gone down from £35 to £12, and had even stood at £10 for some time. Notwithstanding the great ravages inflicted on it, it bears the stamp of a great

Dorchester,¹ Oxon, may be mentioned next. It belonged to the Bishop of Lincoln, and was rated at 90 hides, or to speak with the record, at a hundred hides less ten. The bishop had retained in his farm, that is, for his own account, 60 hides less one virgate, and his knights held 30 hides and one virgate. There were at the time of the Survey 3 plough-teams in demesne, although there was land for 4 ploughs, and 34 villains with 22 bordarii had 15 ploughs. Omitting minor items, we find that the manor rendered £30 a year, while T. R. E. it was only valued at £18. An outlying portion of the same manor held by Bristeva, and amounting to 20½ geld hides and land for 16 ploughs, had also 4 plough-teams in demesne and 20 ploughs among 46 villains and 15 bordarii. The value had gone up from £10 to £20, although it was only worth £8 when the Bishop got it. A point which requires notice in this instance is the comparatively small number of ploughlands and teams in demesne. If there were few teams but a good deal of land one might think that the deficiency of the home-farm teams was supplied by an increased labour of the peasant teams on demesne land. But as there were altogether only four plough-teams on the demesne, the difference would not be more than one ploughland in any case. And yet the increase in value in both portions of the manor is so striking, that there must have been a considerable addition in the quantity of labour performed for the lord. The probable solution is that the peasantry had to till a great deal of gafolerth, as the manor was undoubtedly an agricultural one. A second problem is presented by the enormous taxation estimate—90 hides for some 20 ploughlands, and a value of even £30 seems exorbitant. It looks almost as if there had been a great falling-off in value before the reign of King Edward, which is not otherwise reflected in the Survey.

Chepeham,¹ in Warwickshire, was a Royal manor that had never paid geld nor been rated in hides. It was estimated to contain land for 100 ploughs, a round number which, like that of the Dorchester hides, suggests a very superficial computation from above and not a careful valuation. In this large district there was demesne land for 16 teams, and there were 28 serfs on it, while 48 villains, 45 bordarii, 20 cottarii, and 23 porcarii had between them 66 ploughs. The manor rendered the full farm of a knight, or £110.

In all the instances quoted, and, I believe, in most other cases of large manorial organizations, we are struck by the comparatively small development of the home-farm. In some cases there is a set-off against this in the great quantity of services rendered by the tenants on the demesne, but this is by no means always the case. We are driven to the conclusion that even in the case of large organizations, supposing a relatively great employment of capital, the high income obtained was more the result of tribute, and assignment to the lord of part of the produce of the peasant holdings, than the outcome of a great concentration of labour on domanial land.

3. This is even more striking in the case of the second group, namely, of manors united by a central administration but otherwise presenting heterogeneous elements and scattered parts. Of course it is impossible to draw the line very sharply between types I and II. The Danish and East-Anglian districts, for instance, present many cases in which fairly considerable home-farm centres are formed, and yet the manor is largely composed of scattered tenements and varied rights. Let us take Count Alan's manor of Costessey,² in Norfolk. It had been held

T. R. E. by Harold's brother Guerth, and was rated at 4 carucates to the geld. There were 2 ploughs in demesne, and 5 belonging to the 8 villain and 8 bordarii holdings on the estate. To this central portion of the manor were joined one berewick in Bawburgh of 2 carucates to the geld, 2 ploughs in demesne, and 2 belonging to 6 villains and 6 bordarii. There was another berewick in Thorp, of 1 geld-carucate, with 1 plough in demesne and 4 villains and 3 bordarii with half a plough. To the same manor were added 44 socmen in Estun and Hunincham of 3 geld-carucates with 8 ploughs (12 ploughs T. R. E.), and in Bereford $7\frac{1}{2}$ socmen of 46 acres with 2 ploughs and 6 free villains and 5 bordarii. This entry suggests many questions which have to be reserved to later stages of this book, but I refer to it now as presenting a typical instance of a Norfolk manor with several local subdivisions cultivated by villains and bordarii on the pattern usual in the south, and by the side of them two batches of socmen joined to the same manorial centre by their services or rents. Costessey thus appears primarily as a centre of administration, and this accounts for the disparate settlements combined with it. At the same time, within a narrower sphere, it is an estate of the usual two-storied type, with a home-farm and rustic holdings surrounding it and supplying it with labour. The lord's farm, both in Costessey itself and in the dependent settlements of Bawburgh and Thorp, is of a very modest kind, and so is the husbandry of the tenants. The lord had altogether 5 ploughs in demesne, as against $6\frac{1}{2}$ belonging to the 18 villains and 17 bordarii, and 10 held by the socmen. It is not without significance that the value of the manor had increased from £20 to £45, although the socmen had lost one-third of their teams. The increase was due in some measure to improvements on the home-farms, but the greater part of it must have been produced by the addition of socmen tenants who were formerly independent, and, probably, to heavier duties exacted from all classes of the rustic population.

The Royal manor of Mansfield,¹ Notts, with its two berewicks in Skegby and Sutton, presents another example of administrative as distinguished from economic concentration. Its assessment to the geld was insignificant—merely 3 carucates and 6 bovates; there was land for 9 ploughs. In the King's demesne we find only 2 ploughs, while 5 socmen were assigned 3 bovates in the central estate, and 35 villains and 20 bordarii had $19\frac{1}{2}$ ploughs. But alongside of the central portion represented by Mansfield, Skegby, and Sutton, we find as many as 27 settlements, of which two are marked as berewicks, and four as sokes, while 21 are merely enrolled with a number to denote their assessment to the geld. Neither demesne nor tenants are mentioned in these latter cases, but as they are carefully distinguished from berewicks, they must have been places directly dependent on the main estate, and without any residing representatives of the manorial administration. Their geld assessment, although not a sure indication of their actual economic strength, must have closely corresponded to it, and affords, in any case, a clue as to the proportionate size of these outlying parts. We are clearly in a district of scattered homesteads inhabited by small farmers paying dues to the central court in Mansfield, and possibly performing some services for it, but not subjected to the regular week-work exploitation which necessitated supervision and concentration on the spot, and therefore could not be thought of without at least a berewick to head it. The prevailing system is therefore one of tributary subjection to the manorial administrative centre which happens to be located in Mansfield. Besides the small sokes directly reckoned up with the manor, there is a large soke in Oswardebeck wapentake, of which we need not say anything more on the present occasion but that it was convenient for the purpose of administration to join it to the great centre of control and account in Mansfield, although there was no organic reason for doing so, and one might as well fancy some of the sokes described on f. 281 c as apportioned to other centres.

The famous abbey of St. Denis, near Paris,¹ had a great number of estates in Gloucestershire, six were situated on the east bank of the Severn, with 40 hides to the geld to account for, 15 ploughs in demesne, and 75 villains and 12 bordarii with 39 ploughs. Beyond the Severn there were 10 hides in five estates, with 5 ploughs in demesne, and 9 ploughs held by 5 villains and 18 bordarii. For purposes of administration the whole of these 50 hides were concentrated around Deerhurst manor, which was also the seat of a hundred, and to which there belonged 30 burgesses in Gloucester. There is no mention of any home-farm in Deerhurst, or of any population, and the seat of the manorial counting-house and court must have been fixed in one of the places mentioned as members of Deerhurst hundred. But the whole district was treated as a manorial unit from the point of view of the Royal Exchequer, and for purposes of jurisdiction, accounts, and general supervision.

Something of the same sort may have been the case in some Royal manors like Brailes,¹ or Quinton and Walesbourne in Warwickshire. The first had been in the hand of Earl Edwin, paid geld for 46 hides, and had land for 60 ploughs. There were only 6 in demesne, while 46 ploughs were held by 100 villains and 30 bordarii. The disproportion of the home-farm and the number of villains makes it probable that the rustic population had not been employed, at least originally, in strictly manorial work, but was congregated under administrative supervision and paying tribute. But there is a clear trace of a sudden change in the condition of the population in the leap made by the revenue of the place; instead of yielding £17 10s. it comes to render £55.

Sokes.

4. A third variety is presented by manors acting as centres of extensive sokes. The home-farm element generally exists in such cases, but it plays a subordinate part :² the important thing is the right to jurisdiction and political authority, with the corresponding fines for the non-appearance of suitors, and various public charges and rents. We have already had a prominent example of that kind in the Nottinghamshire manor of Mansfield, to which the soke of Oswardebeck was appendant. The classical land of great sokes is Lincolnshire—with such enormous sokes, for instance, as those of Grantham and Horncastle³—and it would be difficult to do justice to these especially mighty cases in a general review of manorial types. I may call attention to the soke of Bolingbroke,¹ where there were from Saxon times 2 geld-carucates and 2 ploughs in demesne, while 12 villains, 8 bordarii, and 12 socmen had 3 ploughs. The soke of this manor extended over no less than 17 places, many of which were also economically connected with other manors. The number of socmen ascribed to this great court was 529! The description of St. Mary, Stow,² may also be noticed for its characteristic alternation of inland and soke, the first representing the home-farm portions, and the second the jurisdictional lordship connected with it. Sometimes the division is not expressly marked on the map, as it were, but the great preponderance of socmen makes it practically certain that the principal element in the constitution of a particular manor consisted in its jurisdictional rights, and not in the home-farm, and the rustic work supporting it. If we take Wichale,³ for instance, we find it taxed at $3\frac{1}{2}$ carucates less one-third of a bovate. There was land for 6 ploughs, and 4 villains and 42 socmen had 6 teams. No demesne portion is mentioned, and the number of villains is quite insignificant when compared with that of the socmen. It is evident that both Aschil and Outgrim, who held the estate T. R. E., and their Norman successor, drew their income, not from any dominical husbandry, or any considerable services in kind on the part of the villains, but from the dues of the socmen. In fact, the whole settlement appears as an almost complete free community of socmen, with a lord who had to wield hereditary jurisdiction over them. Now, it is a fact that socmen could be subjected to services in kind, and to customary rents,¹ but these were always kept distinct from the week-work of villains proper. Even in the cases where they were especially heavily burdened they were held apart from villains, both by the lesser quantity of their work and by its fixity, its contractual character.² Without going further into this question, of which I had to speak on another occasion, what I have to lay stress on now is the growth of manors out of jurisdictional franchises.³ The manor as a soke is an emphatically free institution: it is a piece of public administration broken off from the hundred and granted to a private lord, but still preserving its public features. The chief home of the sokes are the Danish counties.⁴ The soke is peculiar to them, however, only in the sense that it survived the Conquest and kept its own by the side of the manor and in combination with it in counties where the warriors of the recent Scandinavian conquest were strongly represented. But it has an English name and is a general feature of English history as one of the elements which went to the making of manors all over the kingdom. It has to be studied on the soil of the Danelaw, but it is not difficult to see that its history there makes it exceedingly improbable that southern manors should have been products of a purely economic evolution, and even less probable that they should be in the main mere modifications of servile arrangements.

One fact remains to be noticed in this connexion, namely, the appropriation of hundreds by the feudal aristocracy, and their connexion with manors. In Shropshire, for instance, the hundreds of Comeston and Patinton are bound up with the manor of Cortham,¹ the central portion of which consisted of 5 ploughs in demesne, and 3 ploughs belonging to 3 villains and 3 bordarii. The home-farm in this case was more important than the peasant portion, but both are insignificant enough when compared with the extensive jurisdictional rights attached to the manor. The Buckinghamshire manor of Witehunge was in the same way the jurisdictional centre of the half-hundred of Coteslay.² To the 4 ploughs of its demesne corresponded 51 villain holdings and 20 bordarii, with 21 ploughs, and 15 ploughs could be added. This makes exactly half a hundred, and it is evident that the original arrangement of the manor implied only a soke over the households of the ceorls, and that these were turned into villains, in the later sense, by the Conquest. The case reminds us strongly of the already quoted instances of Brailes and Quinton, in Warwickshire; if I am not much mistaken, the manor of Hitchin, the centre of the half-hundred of His, must have gone through a very similar history, although, in this case, the hardening of the hundred soke into a manorial jurisdiction must have been prepared by Harold, and was only completed by the Norman Conquest.³

5. Royal manors are an important item in the Survey. Royal manors. Observed from the economic point of view they do not form a homogeneous class, but present examples of all the types spoken of hitherto, with some interesting features of their own called forth by their connexion with the King. The capitalistic type, the administrative or tributary type, the jurisdictional type or soke, are all traceable in this group. I have not scrupled, therefore, to use Royal manors as illustrative examples of the already mentioned varieties. But yet Royal manors have to be considered also as a group by themselves, as they exhibit features common to them and different from other classes.

The legal and economic conditions of the tenantry on Royal manors deserve attention in many respects, and may serve to illustrate many points which remain rather obscure when considered from the point of view of the ordinary manorial organization. The reason is easy to see: the King, as sovereign, exercised authority over many classes of the population which were not subjected to any private lordship, and the quasi-manorial aspect of Royal rights in such cases does not entirely conceal their political origin. In any case it is clear to begin with, that the possessions described in Domesday under the heading Terra Regis are not uniformly constituted, and have to be grouped under several subdivisions. There are organized estates of the same kind as those commonly found on the land of ecclesiastical and lay magnates; there are estates of a special character rendering tribute; there are manors acting mainly as centres of Royal jurisdiction; and there are tenements joined loosely to some Royal manor, but not really belonging to any economic organization of the manorial type. Let us look at each of these subdivisions and mark the chief features of their legal and economic condition.

In many cases the Royal manors present a formation almost entirely similar to those of private lords: there is a central demesne and a number of tenants, free and unfree, who are assessed to the geld, and who perform services of different sorts for the benefit of the Royal owner¹

refrain from taking up this thread of study, and will merely examine the entries bearing directly on the ancient possessions of the Crown.

Ancient
demesne.

The germs of the later ancient demesne doctrine are clearly perceptible even in the case of the first group of estates, those most similar to ordinary manors.¹ It was considered that the main stock of Crown estates ought not to be alienated at all: they are sometimes described as belonging, not to the King, but to the Kingdom (regnum).² This initial position was one of the necessary premisses of the doctrine that even in cases of alienation the state of the tenants ought not to be changed, but of course the view in question could be developed as an exception only when the denial of protection to peasants in their relations to their lords had become the common-law rule. Another side of ancient demesne condition is, on the contrary, fully established in its main features at the time of the Great Survey. I mean the immunity of Crown manors from ordinary taxation. The Royal estates were not to pay geld, nor to contribute to other common levies collected by the Sheriff.³ Therefore the estates forming the ancient Crown demesne are described as not rated at a certain number of hides. This did not mean that the tenants of these estates were not distributed on the same kind of holdings—hides, virgates, and bovates—as in other places, but only that there

Materially, this exemption from taxation was explained by the fact that the estates in question were subjected to heavy burdens in connexion with the maintenance of the King's household. A large group among them is liable to the farm of the household for so many nights or days.² Now these food-rents, assessed on the estates in constant quantities, constitute a kind of tribute which rendered unnecessary an extended home-farm husbandry, and threw the weight of economic management on the tenants themselves. The reeve or bailiff was little more than a collector of produce under this system. Accordingly, the central halls of these Royal manors are often quite insignificant as husbandry units¹; they were evidently storehouses more than anything else. In many cases this tributary condition developed directly from the rendering of produce to payment in money, without the intermediate stage of labour arrangements which were the most usual and important expression of the manorial system in other places. And it is to be noticed in this connexion that the food-farm system and the commutation dues which take its place are commonly to be found in the case of Royal boroughs,² that is, of organizations in which the pressure of manorial lordship was especially small and did not involve any element of personal servitude. And some of the rural manors charged to the King's farm are little more than districts in which tribute in produce was being collected by Royal officers.³ The features of capitalistic husbandry and servile labour organization are almost entirely absent in such cases.

Royal
sokes.

The second group of Royal manors is formed by districts in which the manorial hall appears mainly as a centre of jurisdiction and political authority. We have already seen many examples of this in the case of private manors, and recognized in the soke one of the most important transitional forms in the growth of the manorial system. In regard to the formation of Royal estates it is especially common to find that the element of public jurisdiction was materialized, as it were, in the shape of an arrangement of socmen and free tenants around a manorialized estate.¹ Stonleigh in Warwickshire, Newbold in Derbyshire, and Holt in Essex are instances of organizations chiefly characterized by this trait. The economic elements that went to their composition were subordinated to the extended relations derived from the soke over settlements of free tenants.² The same phenomenon recurs in the north in the case of great manors of Queen Edith and of the northern earls, which to all intents and purposes share in the position of Crown manors.³

Lastly, there is a very considerable group of free tenements gradually passing under the manorial authority of the King and of his officers from a condition of independence. These cases are especially clearly set before us in the surveys of Essex and of the East-Anglian counties. The independence of the freeholders is sometimes expressly insisted on.¹ But it is a more usual expedient to note that the freemen or socmen in question belong to the whole hundred,² which means, of course, that they ought to stand outside the manorial divisions. It is difficult to make out precisely on what grounds dominical freemen of the King are entered under a special rubric in Norfolk by the side of the freemen outside the farm, that is, outside the manors.³ Usually, however, free tenants and socmen are distributed between the Royal manors, but the imperfect way in which they are connected with their respective manors is clearly marked by some such expression as iacuerunt manerio, or ad manerium additi sunt, or manerio accomodati sunt.¹ Most of the liberi homines or libere tenentes of the Norfolk and Suffolk manors, and a good many of the socmen, were tenants of this sort, loosely joined to the manors and estimated separately as to geld and as to the holdings attributed to them. Of course, the transition from such a position into one of more strict dependence on the manor was easy, and we notice the next stage in this respect when the liberi homines or sochemanni are entered in the survey of the manor simply as classes of the tenantry alongside other similar groups.² This is the case in most counties where such elements are considerably represented. We have not the means of judging how far the distinction in terminology was determined by a real and deep-going difference of condition; in many cases it may have been simply the result of a more cursory method in handling the materials at hand. But in East Anglia, at any rate, the different treatment of liberi homines and sochemanni cannot have been accidental, and this makes one think that variations of the same kind must have occurred in Yorkshire, Lincolnshire, Leicestershire, &c. Even as to tenants entered as mere villains, it is made clear in a few cases that they were in a rather independent position, and came evidently from the same stock as the freemen of other counties.³ The Royal manors in Kent, although not assessed for farms of nights, seem to have had a similar character; at any rate, the great numbers of their tenants are out of all proportion to the small dominical centres, and in view of the general exemption of Kentish peasants from the burdensome duties of week-work and other servile incidents, there can hardly be a doubt that the villains of a place like Dartford, for instance, were little else than the tribute-paying population collected around a counting-house, and possibly taxed for some minor labour duties in addition to their regular rents.¹ But unfortunately we have to be content with general suggestions in the case of this important class, as there are no means of analysing the various groups of which the class described in Domesday was composed.

riola.’

6. A variety, the social importance of which is much greater than its economic aspect would lead one to suppose, is presented by the numerous cases of very small manors registered in the Survey. There are, to begin with, instances like that of Lutwyche in Shropshire, where the demesne consisted of one ploughland and two bovates, and there was one villain household and one bordarius with half a plough. Now such an entry, which is not the result of devastation, but marks a state of things practically undisturbed by the Conquest, gives material for reflection. The demesne is separated from the peasant portion, and, for all its insignificance, is double the size of the latter.² No serfs are mentioned, and we are led to the conclusion that the household of the solitary villain had to cultivate the demesne portion with the help of the bordarius, while half a ploughland was left for the special use of those rustics. It is not a case of capitalistic or of administrative concentration, but a single farm occupied by two peasant households, a larger and a smaller one, who got some land in remuneration for their labour. Cases of this kind are very frequent, especially in the districts where single homesteads abound.

Then come numerous instances of little 'manors' where no demesne is apparent, and the manorial organization consists in the drawing of certain profits from small groups of peasants who live by themselves, and have no place to perform week-work in. Such is, for instance, Helmerintone in Warwickshire,¹ with land for one plough, which is actually there with three cotsets. This means, I suppose, that the rustics in the place were gathered in three small households, which possibly got their team of oxen from the lord. In Pellinges, Sussex,² a township of four hides and land for four ploughs, there had been four manors T. R. E., and there were two T. R. W., with only one villain and one bordarius to till them. This is seemingly a case of waste, although nothing is said expressly about it, but the absence of demesne is characteristic nevertheless, and at their best the four manors could not have comprised more than one field-carucate each.

A similar case is Binstead, Hants,³ and indeed the whole of f. 53 of the Hampshire Survey describes chiefly infinitesimal manors consisting each of a couple of dependent peasants assigned to some small lord who has no apparent demesne to match the peasant part. Most of these little estates do not show any sign of decay through waste, but have gone on much in the same condition from Saxon to Norman times. The Survey of Leicestershire is also very rich in them.⁴ Devonshire presents sometimes the same phenomenon, with the additional feature that the little farm, considered as a manor, is clearly a pastoral and not an agricultural one. 'Cornewrde,'¹ for instance, a manor of Alured Brito, used to be held by three thanes in the time of King Edward. It paid geld for one virgate, and had land for three ploughs, but no teams are mentioned there. There was one villain and one serf, and 12 acres of meadow and as much wood, and 300 acres of pasture. It was held as three manors T. R. E., but had come to be one in the hands of Alured Brito. The value was always 10 shillings and 6 pence. It would be of no use to speculate on the state of the population of this place in the age of King Edward, the Devonshire Survey not being careful to state how many peasants there were T. R. E. But, as the value remained stationary to a penny, the conditions of husbandry must have continued very much on the same lines, and while the land fit for agriculture was not used, the pastoral economy evidently formed the main concern of the villain household settled in it. Suppose, which is not unlikely, that the same household managed the dairy farm in the Old English period, when its relation to the three manors of which it formed the basis must have led to a division of produce between three claimants—it would be difficult to find a deeper meaning in the expression 'manor' in this case. Nor is this instance of Devonshire husbandry an isolated one.²

Another numerous group of small manors is formed by the cases, especially frequent in the east and north, where free-men, socmen, and thanes appear holding very small estates and cultivating them with their own hands, or, to speak more accurately, with the help of their personal household.

bovate to the geld and land for two oxen. Matthew held half a plough there, and the value remained the same T. R. E. and T. R. W.—three shillings. The place is marked as a manor. The farming must have been more intensive than usual, as four oxen did work on land which, according to common standards, ought to have been cultivated by two, and reckoned at one-fourth of a ploughland. But, anyhow, both the team and the revenue were small indeed. In East Deeping,¹ the abbey of Peterborough had possessed five socmen in five manors rated at two carucates and six bovates to the geld, and containing exactly the same quantity of land fit for ploughing. The place had passed to two vassals of Geoffrey of Cambrai, who turned it into a regular capitalistic manor with $1\frac{1}{2}$ teams in demesne and 12 villains with $3\frac{1}{2}$ teams. The original socage tenants did not always disappear, however, but often went on holding their exiguous manors under a powerful lord and providing for their cultivation. A number of such cases may be quoted from the survey of the Peterborough possessions in Lincolnshire.² It is very common to find these small manors held by self-supporting cultivators in farms of exactly one plough strength.

A case from Somerset may be taken on account of its rather complex setting. Under the rubric 'Anglici tegni', evidently designating military tenants of English race who had somehow kept their land after the Conquest, we find one Brictrius holding a manor called 'Tocheswilla',³ which a certain Godwin had held T. R. E. It did not pay geld at that time, but it contained—the jurors know that it contained—land of half a virgate to the geld. This could have been tilled by a plough-team. As a matter of fact, half a team was employed there, and 4 bordarii and one serf are mentioned without any definite endowment, so that they probably had to till the demesne. There were, besides, 4 acres of wood and 7 of pasture. It rendered 12 shillings and 6 pence. We find a series of such small places in Shropshire,¹ and their holders are sometimes designated as freemen and sometimes as radmen—riding tenants.² Their social formation seems determined by two facts—scattered farm-settlements with the tendency to form complete ploughlands, and the existence of a class of small free tenants used as riding sergeants for carrying messages, supervision of outlying possessions, and probably for military purposes. Similar cases may be quoted from Gloucestershire and Warwickshire,³ although these latter counties were not settled mainly on the single-farm system. A curious and illuminating instance may be cited from Dorset, where Chimedecome was held T. R. E. by 10 thanes ‘as one manor’. It paid geld for one hide and one-third of a virgate. There was land for one plough, and a team was actually at work in the place.⁴ This typical ploughland seems a very small basis for the support of these ten thanes, and yet it is hardly anything else but a large household of small military sergeants of the King, joined in husbandry as well as in their ‘forinsec service’ or ‘utwaru’. Without prejudging further developments, we are entitled, I think, to compare all the cases just mentioned with the manors of the thanes and drengs of Lancashire—small carucate or hide holdings subjected to some organizing influence of large Royal manors.¹ The tenants of these latter were undoubtedly warriors of light equipment who had to manage their own agricultural work and do some work for their lords, but whose main characteristic was their sergeantry in peace and war.

The east and north provide us with a number of examples of manors rated at 40, 30, and even 20 acres, held and tilled by some free tenants—liberi homines, or socmen. It must not be forgotten, however, that the acres in these cases are emphatically geld-acres, and often correspond to whole ploughlands or large portions of them.² A curious instance is the 'maneriolum'³ of Bishop Remigius of Lincoln, contiguous to that city and provided with all rights of sac and soc, toll and team; it gave occupation to one plough-team only, and no under-tenants were mentioned in it. How was it cultivated? By hired labour? or has the attention bestowed on the enumeration of the franchise privileges occasioned a blank in regard to the tenants settled in the 'maneriolum'? We cannot say, but the little plough-team manor is characteristic enough as it is. With its franchises, it might turn out to be the germ of a great organization.

One of the most important features of the extant notices about these microscopic 'manors' is the insight afforded by their history into the process of formation and the character of the larger units. Already in the instances quoted hitherto we have often had occasion to observe how the small organizations were being swallowed up by big neighbouring estates, or how estates of considerable extent were formed by the joining together of several independent farms. These instances could be multiplied to any extent,¹ and the facts of this natural 'integration' of small estates into larger units with more complex organization throw light on one of the chief causes of the process which called 'manors' of the more developed types into existence. They presented a kind of compromise between the originally independent cultivation and ownership of small households, and the forces of patronage and exploitation embodied in the great lordships. The resultant line of both developments was found in the characteristic combination of a domanial centre and the dependent economy of the tenants.

Anglo-Saxon
origins.

7. We have now to consider the important question how far the manorial system, so generally prevailing in England at the time of the Survey, is to be traced back into Saxon times. Domesday Book supposes everywhere that there were manors in the reign of King Edward, and that the existence and rights of the Norman manors have to be drawn from them. The very fact that the numbers and composition of these manors were not identical T. R. E. and T. R. W. makes it the more necessary to mark exactly what the relation between both formations was; and the Survey informs us with minute accuracy as to the subdivision of certain manors into smaller items² in consequence of partition between co-heirs, or the sale¹ of one or the other among them, of violent modifications in their state by the forcible abduction of some of the tenants,² or by the forcible addition of others,³ of the joining together of different manors into one,⁴ and similar contingencies. These variations undoubtedly testified to the fact that the manorial system was not something immovable, fixed once for all; it was an aggregate, a living organism, but yet the Survey always supposes that it was in full growth at the time of Edward the Confessor and even before. Now this must be true of the material conditions of manorial life, but not of its legal and economic systematization. Neither the term manor nor any corresponding and equally comprehensive designation occurs in Saxon times; nor was the land-law of the Old English epoch identical with that of the conquerors, and very important differences are to be noticed in regard to local administration, justice, feudal service—in a word, in all the constituent elements of the subject. We thus come to the conclusion that the compilers of the Survey overstated their case when they currently spoke of manors as they existed T. R. E., but they did it in good faith, and must have had some good reasons for doing so.

On closer examination we find that the summarizing terminology and the unifying legal treatment adopted by the Survey were the results of facts which had actually existed before, though in a rather straggling condition, with many gaps and irregularities. If we look to the antecedents of the manor in A.-S. times, we do not find a single institution corresponding to the Conquest manor, but we do find several institutions working each by itself, but combining in practice to produce the inchoate manorial system which Domesday supposes everywhere. These institutions are the hām or cotlif, the estate centre; the bōcland, privileged land tenure; the soke, jurisdictional franchise; and the landrica's or landhlaford's patronage, the element of lordship.

*Hām*¹ and *cotlif*² are the expressions which most closely correspond to mansio and manor. Like the latter, they lay stress on the element of residence, and point primarily to the hall or court—to the residence of the owner of an estate or of his steward, but they usually extend their meaning and include the district dependent on the lord's residence, as well as the rustic population settled on the territory for purposes of cultivation. It is, however, in the sense of mansions or halls, that the Chronicle uses these terms when telling of the ravages of the Danes.³ These expressions lay stress on the economic and capitalistic side of manorial life—on the estate, as such. But they contain already some elements of local authority for purposes of police and justice, the ancient authority of the hearthfast man, the hlaford over his household and labourers—his hired. This kind of authority was not necessarily bound up with considerable estates. Even the owner of a small one, of a hide or carucate, could wield it over his own people if otherwise qualified. Let us notice in connexion with this that the Hiwisc, in regard to land tenure, appears frequently in the local terminology of those times. As the expression is by itself a very general one, it must have acquired a determinate sense from the context; for instance, by pointing to a settlement in a wild country amid pastoral surroundings, the denes of a forest district. It denoted sometimes exactly one hide,¹ but there was nothing to prevent the estate from assuming great dimensions.² It is hardly needful to say as to the hams themselves, that as proper names they may have swerved considerably from their original meaning of a hlaford's estate. They could grow to be the centre of very large settlements, in which the manorial element was not prominent, if it existed at all. Grantham is a hám, for instance, and one of the largest self-governing sokes in England. But the appellative hám is certainly a very near equivalent to manor, as an estate.

The second Saxon root of the manor is the bócland, the privileged piece of land exempted from all ordinary obligations of common tenure, and endowed with the rights of private property, capable of alienation and transmission by testament, but subject to one of the two most urgent requirements of the time—formed to support thanes for military service, or priests for religious service. Without dwelling on the ecclesiastical side of these grants, so well known and copiously illustrated by the charters, let us remember that the siðcundman landagende, the thane owning land, undertook special obligations in regard to fyrð service.¹ They were exposed to much harder punishments if they failed to perform them than the rest of the community. The confiscation of their land by the king in all cases of default, without distinction as to the direct allegiance of the culprits, is a very characteristic measure, showing that military service was beginning to assume the character of a special duty of landowners.

Domesday gives us a noteworthy illustration of this tradition in the way it treats bócland in its terminology. In the description of the Bishop of Coutances' (formerly Edric's) manor of Boui, the Exon Domesday begins by giving an ordinary description of a middle-sized mansio with land for 10 ploughs and 13 teams. But then it proceeds to state that to this estate was added the land of 15 thanes, and then gives the names and tenantry of those mansiones called *bochelanda*² over the line in the MS. This is a case of small estates held in parage: there was land for 8 ploughs and 7 teams to till it. The size does not matter, as we know there were hundreds of small thanes. The equation drawn between mansiones and bochelanda is precious. It may have originated in the wish of the compilers to get rid of the repetition of mansio, as the term had already been used to denote Edric's large estate, although, as we know from many instances, such 'submanors'³ were quite common. But whatever the occasion, the gloss retains its value, and discloses an important link between Norman feudalism and a widely extended Old English institution. On another occasion, in the same Exon Domesday, an estate called Bocland is described as being held by a thane T.R.E., hanc mansionem tenuit unus tainus liberam, and this reads like an explanation of the Saxon name. Immediately afterwards we come across another Bocland held by another thane, and it is mentioned that it was a free manor T.R.E., but subsequently was added to Bristric's land.¹ It is remarkable in this connexion that the designation bôcland occurs frequently in place-names in different counties, and often in estates which lie near to each other, so that it seems to have been originally used as an appellative.² 'Bocland' could become eventually a proper name, because it denoted privileged property, and therefore could be used to designate a particular place. It would be impossible to mark any prevalent size for these bôcland-manors, but it may be worth notice that they sometimes appear as five-hide estates.³ There is quite a number of curious places called Fifehide, a designation which must have had a technical origin, as by the side of hiwisc it is the only one in which a number of hides is referred to. We never hear of Twohides or Threehides or Sevenhides or Tenhides, but 'Fivehides' is not uncommon.⁴ It seems natural to connect this with the well-known importance of the fivehide unit in regard to social status. The 'thriving' of the thane and of the wealh was graduated by this very limit, and so was military service.

It was the acquisition of five hides that enabled a warrior to aspire to the rank of king's thane, and led to the passage into the class of twelvehyndmen for him, or to sixhyndmen in the case of the prosperous wealth. There is a remarkable entry in the Berkshire survey¹ which shows that the 5 hides in question were not taken as the thane's home-farm, but as the estimate of a district or estate of villains which stood under him. This would correspond strictly to the 5 hides at Cyninges utwaru of the famous fragment about the thriving of the thane, and it would be difficult not to recognize in the villains in question the Saxon ceorls on gafolland, transformed after the Conquest into villains on warland or villains holding 5 hides de wara.

I will not speak again at any length of the Old English soke, as this subject has already occupied a good deal of our time, and will come up again in the chapters on personal status. The only point which I should like to recall to mind is the universal use of the soke in Saxon England. The soke as a jurisdictional authority is not less frequently mentioned in the southern counties² than in the half-Scandinavian north and east, and, indeed, is much more frequently attested in those very shires where we do not hear at all of separate sokes and hear very little about socmen. In any case, the villains of Berkshire or Kent were subjected to the manorial jurisdiction and the private hundreds of their feudal lords, not as former serfs or slaves, but as former ceorls over whom sac and soc had been ceded by Edgar or Æthelstan. If there had been a Domesday Survey about 986 we would perhaps have found the inhabitants of southern shires still divided into their original groups, like the Norfolk population of 1086, instead of being fused into the uniform mould of villinage. The fact that no such Survey exists constitutes an argument from silence, which is hardly sufficient to arrest further inquiries. Indeed, the laws and charters tell us clearly enough that sokes were not the same thing as håms in the tenth and eleventh century.

The fourth Old English root of the manorial system is ^{Landlord-}the institutions of lordship, which we find in full work ^{ship.} in the last two centuries of Saxon rule. When we read in Archbishop Ælfric's will (A.D. 1006) that he bequeaths the land at Dumeltun to Abingdon, and gives three hides of it to Ælfnoth for life, with the provision that he should follow the lordship to which the land belongs, we have to construe the instrument in the sense that Abingdon gets authority over Ælfnoth and his land even before it falls by reversion into the hands of the monks,¹ and this kind of authority or lordship meets us again and again in the laws, in the shape of the patronage of the landhlaford or of the landrica. It is especially prominent in regard to all sorts of police arrangements—the following on the track of stolen cattle, the production of warranty in regard to the sale of animals, the catching of thieves, and the responsibility for the good behaviour of the people living under the landlord's patronage,¹ but it is clear that the position of the landrica was naturally akin to that of a lord possessing sac and soc on the one hand, to that of the owner of a håm in regard to its labouring population on the other. Indeed, part of the sac and soc formula—its claims of team, infangenetheof and utfangennetheof²—connects itself necessarily with the rights of a landrica. It is interesting to see that in Canute's reign an attempt was made to treat the whole country as subdivided into landrica districts ;¹ and in the interesting fragment on the wedding of a wife it is also supposed that every kindred arranging a contract of marriage with another kindred is settled on the land of some thane, and is under the special protection of its local law.² These indications may not amount to a perfectly accurate description of the state of land law in those times ; they suppose a uniformity which is not quite realized even later ; but they convey the impression made upon contemporaries that the land of England was more or less carved out into territorial lordships, in which aristocratic chiefs had to look after law and police, and were made responsible for public order to central authority. Needless to say that this arrangement was not invented at pleasure by the sovereigns of the tenth century and their witan. It grew slowly out of practices of patronage which were introduced from the very time of the early English settlements on British soil—practices of private patronage to which the most ancient records of English and Teutonic legal custom testify.³ But these bonds of personal patronage and clientship were gradually transformed into real relations based on land tenure ; the hlaford became a landhlaford ; men commended to his protection became more and more his dependants, not only as to their persons, but in regard to their land also.

A number of drastic illustrations of the difficulty of keeping these different sets of relations consistently apart may be found in the frequent verdicts of Domesday jurors trying to disentangle personal commendation from the dependence of land,⁴ and to settle definitely when people had a right to go with their land where they pleased, and when they could not take land out of the lordship.¹ These questions of Old English law were of primary importance after the Conquest—although the practice of voluntary and personal commendation was not kept up—because they afforded a clue for the assignment of pieces of land to manors, and to the settlement of questions of ownership. The lawyers of William the Conqueror started from the principle that mere personal commendation did not amount to a dependence of the land,² and that a tenant who could go with his land where he pleased was not part and parcel of the manor in which he paid his dues to a lord.³ But there is ample evidence to show how difficult it was to keep up these distinctions,⁴ and it is a characteristic fact that they were less frequent in the southern counties, where condition was regulated by rougher and more uniform standards. It is chiefly in the north and east that the discussions about commendation, soke, and landownership constantly recur.¹

Honours.

8. The manor is the principal unit of organization recognized by Domesday, but it is not the only one. Manors may be grouped into higher units according to different points of view. There is, to begin with, the unit of an honor; it occurs already in Domesday, but comes to play a greater part later on. In the Survey it appears mostly as an equivalent of feudum, in the sense of a complex of landed property and rights combined in one person, and perpetuated as a unit after the original holder has given place to others. Thus, if we hear of the feudum Frederici, we also hear of the honor Edmeratorii or the honor Ordulfi,² and, later on, honours of any size and composition appear as great fiefs created for well-known men, and from which succession or infeudation has to be traced. By the side of this use of the word another is noticeable—namely, the history of a complex of property is derived, not from a person, but from a locality which appears as the chief seat of the honour, its capital manor, and gives its name to the whole group. Thus we hear later on of the honours of Berkhamstead, of Wallingford, of Broughton.³ In these cases something more than an historical reminiscence as to descent seems indicated, and the central manor may turn out to be the capital of a barony, or the seat of a court exercising the higher franchises for a series of manors.¹ We do not yet notice in Domesday traces of such great regional organizations, but there are a few expressions which show that honor was not used quite indiscriminately of any combination of estates. Already a phrase like 'ad honorem pervenit'—when A had obtained the honour—makes one think that the existence of a particular honour was a fact preceding its acquisition by the person from whom it might otherwise draw its name.² Then we hear of the 'honor comitis' and even 'honor comitum'; terms appearing as an equivalent of 'comitatus', and this leads to the conception of a complex of estates somehow connected with a dignity, an official position, and not a casual combination of personal rights.³ As a rule, the honour appears as a group of manors, but in one case at least it is used irrespectively of any such grouping, and in a sense where feudum militis or manerium itself might have been used instead. I mean the famous passage in the survey of Wiltshire, where the burgesses of Malmesbury are said to be bound to send a warrior to the King's expedition 'pro honore v hidarum'.⁴ The five-hide unit recalls the obligation of the Berkshire men to send one man to the wars for every 5 hides on one hand, the thane's fee of 5 hides and the five-hide manors on the other. The term honour is significant in so far as it shows that the comparison was not drawn with any chance accumulation of 5 hides, but with a fee held by one tenant, in fact, a thane's fee of 5 hides.

As for the baronies, their formation belongs to a later epoch, and the only thing that can be deduced from stray indications in the Domesday Survey is that sometimes attempts were made to round off the possessions of great tenants-in-chief. As we have seen, in the case of Eustache de Boulogne there is a mention of a hundred manors as the contents of his fee, an expression which cannot refer to the number of actual estates held by him, but, possibly, to the number of knights' estates or fees considered as normal for his 'honour'. An expression is used in regard to Hugh de Montfort¹ which might lead one to suppose that the number of his manors was also raised to a definite sum, but these indications are too vague to build any theory upon them.

groups.

The second basis for grouping manors is provided by the wish to make their produce fit the requirements of a large household. The Royal household is supposed to require a certain quantity of provisions and provender—so many loaves of bread, fitches of bacon, sesters of honey, &c. The whole quantity, a very considerable one, makes up the so-called farm of one night, or farm of one day, and the Royal manors in Domesday are combined in groups, in order to levy the necessary quantity of victuals, or to pay a corresponding sum of money. In Dorset, Dorchester, Fortitone, Sutton, Gellingeham, and Fromme combine to render a farm of one night. It takes altogether 56 ploughs and 114 villains, besides 9 bordarii, 12 coliberti, and 20 serfs, to raise the revenue. Pimpre and Cerleton, with land for 20 ploughs, and 18 actual teams, raise only half a farm of one night, and Winfrode, Alulurda and Wintrebourne make up another half-farm among themselves.¹ In Hampshire, Basingstoke, Clere, and Essebourne are grouped to render a farm of one day.² In Derbyshire, the farms of one night or of one day have disappeared, but five Royal manors form a group rendering £32 and 6½ sesters of honey, or £40 instead, and another group of three manors has to pay £30 and 5½ sesters of honey, and 5 cart-loads(?) of lead; the remnant of the rent in kind may be commuted for £10 6s.³ It may happen that some private manors have to render dues to some great Royal manor, and it seems in such cases that these dues are remnants of a time when all the estates in question formed one group, and that even after the granting away of portions of it some of the dues were reserved. But it is impossible to trace any definite policy or numerical combinations in such instances.⁴

The manors belonging to a great tenant-in-chief may be styled his 'division'.⁵ Estates held by the same lord, as a mesne tenant, would not be considered to be within his division,⁶ so that this term evidently aims at representing the original distribution of estates produced by the Conquest, and does not cover subsequent transactions.

The rape is a group of manors considered not only as a complex of property, but also as a large unit for the payment of geld.¹ Therefore privileged estates and holdings exempted from geld would be termed outside the rape, and the fact of their being owned by a particular magnate would in no way be contested by such an expression.² The term rape is, however, a provincial one; we find it only in Sussex.

CHAPTER II

THE DEMESNE.

1. THE lord's part in the manor is naturally called domi- Domini nicum, demesne. The term admits of two main acceptations; cum.
it may point to the estates, or part of the estates, assigned to the use of the tenant-in-chief, in opposition to those given over to military followers—thanes, knights, or sergeants.¹ Or else it may point to the home-farm, as distinguished from the holdings of the tenants, and it is in this sense that we find the expression on every page of Domesday Book. The immediate object of demesne is to provide for the food² of the lord and of his household, probably also for their clothing. The Old English expression corresponding to the Low Latin dominium or dominicum is hired. It is used commonly in the same general sense as we use 'household' nowadays,³ but it has not yet acquired the technical meaning of the later dominicum, because the combined system of husbandry had not yet come to be the prevailing feature of agrarian organization.

We have already had occasion to touch several times on the part played by the demesne in rural arrangements, and I will refer to it very briefly at present.⁴ The separate home-farm, cultivated for its own needs, exists, but it is an exception. It occurs chiefly in cases of very small estates, with one plough-team, or less.¹ In all these cases the work of the place is done either by small freemen, or by serfs and bordarii—villains occur very seldom. But the regular thing, of course, is the juxtaposition of the demesne-farm, and of a certain number of tenant holdings. A very ordinary arrangement is the combination of a very small home-farm—one or two ploughs—and a very large number of tenants around it. This may be said to be the prevailing case in East Anglia and Lincolnshire, and can hardly be accounted for on any other supposition than that the domanial centre was a kind of adjunct, and served more as a counting house and the seat of a court than for purposes of husbandry. The socmen, and even the villains, in these cases followed very much their own economic course, although bound to render rents, and possibly to perform a few boonworks and other customary services.² But these insignificant manorial home-farms are by no means confined to the emphatically free districts. There is, e.g., the great manor of Thanet belonging to St. Augustine, Canterbury.³ It was rated at 48 sulungs, and contained land for 62 ploughs. There were only two plough-teams in demesne, while 150 villains and 50 bordarii had 63 ploughs between them. Of the land of the villains, three knights held as much as was worth £9 when there was peace in the country, and they had three ploughs there. It is difficult to say whether the knights contented themselves with drawing income from the villains, or whether they had occupied their land with their own home-farm of three ploughs. But the chief manor is constituted in a very peculiar way; it was evidently based on rents and occasional services, and later 'extents' fully bear out this inference.¹ Kent, of course, is practically as much the land of freedom as Norfolk or Lincolnshire. But occasionally the same state of things occurs in the west and south. The manor of Wiche, Gloucester, e.g., paid geld for 1 hide, and there was only 1 plough on its demesne, while 35 villains, 16 bordarii, a priest, and 13 rodknights had 52 ploughs between them. There were 12 serfs, and these usually indicate home-cultivation, but in the case under discussion some of them may have been employed on the mills, of which there were four in the place.² Sapey in Worcestershire was a much smaller estate, but its constitution must have been of exactly the same kind. It paid geld for 3 hides, and yet there were only 9 plough-beasts in the home-farm, a fact which seems to have attracted the attention of the Domesday jurors themselves; 9 villains and 4 bordarii had 11 ploughs between them, and 3 more teams could have been employed.³ All these cases would fall under the second head of our manorial classification; they are best accounted for on the principle of what may be called the levying of tribute—varied rents in this case, for the collection and accounting of which the small manorial farm afforded a convenient centre; but the peculiarity of the instances under consideration is, that the tributary tenants of the Gloucestershire and Worcestershire estates are not scattered in different places, but congregated in large villages.

Cases of more evenly balanced relation between home-farm and tenant-holdings are more frequent, however. They correspond to a greater employment of capital on the home-farm itself, and come up under the first type of our classification. The great pioneers in this direction were the ecclesiastical institutions. We find on their estates the largest concentrations of capital and the most systematic combinations of peasant labour to support them.¹ And yet it is noteworthy that even in this group of estates we hardly ever come across traces of very large home-farms. Evidently it was throughout more advantageous to leave most of the work of cultivation on the shoulders of the peasant farmers. Nor is it at all necessary that the demesne land should lie in compact plots: it may as well join in the open-field system of the tenants and consist of strips scattered among their holdings. Domesday Book gives too general a description to afford such details, which are well established both by later and earlier evidence, but we may occasionally catch a glimpse of them even in our Survey.²

One difficulty in our reading of Domesday evidence is to estimate the exact proportion which the 'customs of the town-

ships' (consuetudines villae) bore to demesne cultivation in the combined husbandry of the home-farm—what was done for it by peasant teams, how much did it depend on the help of the peasants for harvest, threshing, and all other kinds of farm-work? If we are to judge from eleventh-century evidence, the best way is to notice the surplusage of geld commonly charged to the demesne in consequence of the additional advantages it derived from the customary work of the peasants. I will quote two cases from Lincolnshire, where the problem seems reduced to a very simple expression. The manor of Holm¹ was rated T. R. E. at 24 geld carucates, and of these Ulf had 12 and 12 were assigned to the soke. T. R. W. the successor of Ulf, Gislebert, has 4 teams in demesne, and 28 socmen, 28 villains, and 3 bordarii have 14 teams. The equal division of the geld must have remained at the later period, but the demesne had only 4 teams to show for the 12 carucates, while 14 teams went to the peasants' portion: the balance must have been restored by the rents of the socmen, and especially by the auxiliary services of the villains. A similar case is reported from Goldesbi.² The geld is divided quite equally between lord and tenants—4½ bovates in demesne and 4½ bovates in the soke, which represents the whole non-domanical part of the estates in these cases. And yet Colegrim, the holder, both T. R. E. and T. R. W., had only one plough-team, while 2 socmen and 6 villains had two. The Middlesex survey, and those of several other counties, constantly show the same surplusage³ of geld assessment on the demesne portion, a fact which cannot be explained on any other ground but that the dues and services with which the tenants were burdened in favour of the demesne were very properly reckoned up on its side, and that the land income-tax of the geld represented in its two parts the repartition of estimated income between the lord and the tenants, and by no means the revenue of the home-farm only.

Hall. 2. The demesne is not only a home-farm, but also a centre of administration. In this respect it is represented by the hall¹ or the court (aula, halla). As a rule, the hall is necessary to constitute a manor, and it may be said, in a sense, to be the manor itself, inasmuch as the manor-house was a place of residence for the lord or his steward. The intimate relation of the two terms may be gathered from the following passage of the Yorkshire Domesday: 'In Kirkby² there were 8 carucates to the geld, and land for 4 ploughs. Ulchil has a manor there ($1\frac{1}{2}$ car.); Ligul, Tor, Gamel, and Siward had the rest of the land with one hall.' The hall of the latter half of the sentence corresponds to the manor of the first. There is a difference in the use of the two expressions, inasmuch as the first may be taken in a wider as well as in a more restricted sense, while the second has only the latter—that of a place of residence and administration. But still the most prominent and important feature of a manor is that it has a hall in which the lord can live and rule. For this reason, all appliances and buildings which appertain to the demesne, or serve it more particularly, are said to serve the hall, no matter whether the manor be large or small. There are mills and forges serving the hall,¹ ploughs belonging to the hall,² horses and other animals in the hall.³ In a curious Berkshire notice a wrongful owner is said to have abstracted and brought over to another manor the hall and other buildings and the chattels of the estate of Ebrige. The abduction of the chattels—meaning cattle, implements, and, possibly, stores and money—may perhaps be taken in the literal sense, but in regard to the buildings nothing worse than appropriation to another manor can be meant.⁴

The hall may be opposed to the soke in the same way as demesne is sometimes opposed to soke.⁵ Complications arose in some cases. In Langeton, Yorkshire, e.g., rated at the geld for 9 carucates, Torfin and Fingal had two halls, and of the two only Torfin had sac and soc. The rest of the land was held by a third parcener called Tor, who had sac and soc but no hall.¹ This is an example of the extent to which rights of property could be sometimes differentiated in practice. It might happen that only the demesne in the immediate administration of the hall was under the soke of the owner.²

The home-farm is every now and then described especially in connexion with the hall. In Danish districts it may consist of a single toft, a fenced plot.³ In purely English districts we find it described as a virgate⁴ or a hide.⁵ This is the mansus indominicatus of continental documents, not necessarily the whole home-farm, although sometimes it may have formed the chief portion of the estate. When distinctness and accuracy are aimed at, the Survey speaks of the demesne of the hall, or the demesne belonging to the hall,⁶ but, for the sake of brevity, the hall may stand for the demesne as a whole, or for domanial authority.⁷ It might be even said that a tenant was free from the hall, in the sense of his being, for some reason, free from dues to the hall.¹ This kind of exemption has to be distinguished from the occasional exemption of demesne land from the payment of taxes, which is also expressly mentioned every now and then.²

The importance of the element of residence and administration in the constitution of the manor is especially brought out by the very frequent instances of halls being kept up by landowners living in the same place, and sometimes closely allied in their proprietary and economic relations. In a very small place called Ballebi in Yorkshire $4\frac{1}{2}$ bovates belonged to two thanes, and each of them had a hall.³ Two brothers holding an estate in parage commonly have two halls.⁴ Now this appearance of two halls is taken by the compilers of the Survey to indicate the existence of two manors, and it is therefore sometimes expressly said that one manor has taken the place of two halls.⁵ A singular case is reported from Norfolk, where a freeman, possessed of one carucate, entered as a manor and occupied by 22 bordarii and one serf, indulged in the luxury of living in two halls.⁶

It would be wrong to suppose, however, that manors Manors

without halls were impossible. They do occur. Sellinges, e.g., was quite a considerable Kentish estate of St. Augustine, Canterbury. It paid geld for 6 sulungs. There was nothing in demesne, but 30 villains had 10 ploughs there.¹ 'Platenout,' 'Postinges,' 'Belice,' are estates of the same kind.² In Fenton, Notts, a certain Sperauoc held 2 $\frac{2}{3}$ bovates to the geld and land for one plough, with sac and soc, but there was no hall.³ In this case the land was waste.

The explanation is not far to seek. If we leave the Nottinghamshire instance on one side, as possibly brought about by devastation, the cases of manors without halls are found to belong to the by no means insignificant class of manors without demesne, inhabited and cultivated entirely by peasants. These people were in their way dependent on the manorial lord; they paid rents in money and kind, performed, probably, carriage service, possibly even boonworks once or twice a year at some neighbouring manorial centre, but on the whole they lived by themselves and were independent of direct meddling with their affairs. The manor could dispense with a hall in such a case, and the dues were either brought by the peasants themselves to some hall in other manors, or might be fetched by the lord's riding bailiffs or stewards. This class is not large if compared with the more usual type, but is very characteristic, because it leads us naturally to suppose that even in many cases where there was a hall and some demesne, the interference of the lord in the affairs of the community did not actually amount to much.

The hall or court, being the seat of the lord, may be called the head of the manor (caput manerii), and there are entries in Domesday Book telling us exactly where this head has to be looked for.¹ It is even said once that a particular thane is the head of a manor, but this probably only means that the hall was in his holding, and that the tenant-in-chief had no special court there.² The term caput manerii is the equivalent of heafod botl,³ the Old English expression for the hall, showing, if it were needed, that the system of estate administration from a central dwelling or holding, with satellites around it, had been going on for a long while before the French conquest.

3. The functions connected with the hall or court belong The Court. to one of two distinct sets of relations. There is the court for purposes of jurisdiction and local government, and there are the offices and stores of the economic centre. The first, the curia, in the technical sense, was not necessarily held in the hall itself:⁴ in many places the tradition of the open-air moot was still kept up at later times.⁵ But the meeting of villagers for the regulation of their agrarian affairs and the transaction of police and legal business was necessarily convened and presided over by the manorial lord (landrica) or his representative. Its different attributes as a court of sac and soc, as a union of tenants, and as a village gathering for agrarian purposes, are clearly distinguishable in later times, although the court is not originally differentiated according to these various duties. The indications we get in Domesday on this subject are very sporadic and barren, although it would not do to minimize for this reason the importance of the institution itself. It is not the frequency or fullness of information that can provide a standard for estimating the relative influence of early mediaeval institutions, and it would be very misleading to regulate our appreciation of them by the number of direct quotations about them. Still, some indirect indications there are, even in Domesday. We know, for instance, that sac and soc does not necessarily arise in every hall; it is a matter of franchise and grant. Nor are the numerous halls of microscopic manors necessarily seats of manorial courts, although they are certainly seats of some economic administration, however rudimentary. We are left to guess that this administration amounted in separate farms to the commands of a landowner or steward to his couple of dependants; while in other instances, especially in open-field country, or in the case of regulated fen, wood, and pasture commons, claims and by-laws had to be adjusted by meetings of people belonging to several manors, and even townships.¹ We shall have to come back to these questions by and by.

Modo est in manu regis preter terciam partem et Tainum qui est caput manerii quem tenet Ilbertus.' The thane in question was evidently Uluiet or a successor of his, and the hall must have been in his possession still.

The stores. 4. Let us now turn to the offices and stores of the lord's hall. The manorial grange is put clearly before us,² and it is not without reason that the grange has come to be the local name of some very grand mansions of later times. The corresponding Saxon 'berton' appears mostly in local names,¹ but its use as an appellative indicating grange or corn-stores is easily traceable.²

This leads us to an important feature of manorial organization—namely, to the part played by berewicks as subordinate centres of manorial life. The berewick derives its name, like the berton, from a corn-store, a grange.³ It is naturally connected with the demesne, and the connexion is sometimes expressly dwelt upon.⁴ It may assume the size and importance of a considerable manor, and get to be a market-place by itself:⁵ this would be a matter of economic growth. But as a rule the berewick is an appendix, a member of a manor; the latter would stand over it in the hierarchy of economic organization.⁶ The system of out-lying berewicks, acting as satellites of one central manor, and forming with it a great social organization, is carried very far in some parts of the country, especially in the districts on the borders of Wales, where it seems to have afforded a convenient intermediate link between Welsh tributary settlements and the central hall of a Saxon or French landlord. In the manor of Roelent, a wild region included in Shropshire, there were four berewicks—Dissaren, Bodugan, Chiluen, and Maineval. There was only one ploughland for them all, and one freeman and 2 villains occupied in tilling the land—the rest was forest. Three other batches of berewicks are mentioned, and to each one ploughland is assigned, while under the protection of the castle of Roelent there worked three teams with 7 serfs. The berewicks had been waste in the time of King Edward, but Earl Hugh of Shrewsbury, the Norman landlord, had brought them up to an annual value of 110 shillings.¹

The berewicks are also frequent in the east, because scattered possessions are common there too, although from different reasons than in the west. While the land of a manor is scattered, on the Welsh side, on account of imperfect cultivation and wild conditions of life, in the east it is scattered because the great lords have not succeeded in bringing the population and the country under systematic and universal subjection. The territory of their manors is patched, somehow, of broken fragments, and, as a result, subsidiary centres for the collection of dues are needed. The berewicks are carefully distinguished from sokes, however, because they are primarily centres of husbandry, while the sokes are political and jurisdictional districts. The expression inland is commonly used in these half-Scandinavian parts to denote a small portion of demesne attached to a manor, or a small dependent estate with demesne and villains, in opposition to the sokes.² In such cases the term inland does not convey an idea of exemption from geld, but is true to its original sense of the inner, or demesne portion of an estate, reserved for the husbandry of the owner; in fact, the home-farm, or, at least, an estate administered by the steward of the owner, and not by free socmen subjected to jurisdiction. In regard to assessment, the berewicks are treated differently—some are included in the assessment of their manor, others are taxed separately.¹

As a consequence of this use of berewick for a portion of the domanial estate, we may come across queer expressions like 'turning' a socman or a freeman 'into a berewick':² the point is, of course, that a holding belonging to a free tenant is turned into a subsidiary farm of the manor. It has already been noticed that it is difficult to draw a hard and fast line between a berewick and a manor; the first may become the latter by prospering, or by receiving a separate and complete administration of its own. We therefore read of berewicks registered or considered as manors (pro manerio). The main difference lay in the fact that the manor had supervision over its berewicks, and was more completely organized in point of husbandry, and especially of jurisdiction. But this was more a matter of degree than of kind,

¹ The berewicks are assessed jointly in Newbold, Derby. Dd. i. 272 b: 'In Neuuebold cum vi Berewitis: Witintune, Brimintune, Tapetune, Cestrefeld, Buitorp, Echintune. and many of the small Domesday manors were less considerable, and less developed, than the berewicks of some large neighbouring estates.

There remain to be considered one or two terms and arrangements of the same kind as the berewick but yet distinguished from it. There is a curious case in the Berkshire survey¹ which puzzled the Domesday commissioners, and cannot fail to puzzle us. Bishop Osbern holds in demesne an estate called Bocheland as belonging to his see. And yet Uluric lived in that estate in the time of King Edward. The commissioners dare not decide, and reserve the case for the consideration of the King himself. The conditions of the estate itself are very peculiar. There is no demesne, but there are 9 villains and 7 cotters with four ploughs, a church and a mill and 7 serfs. And there is a 'wica' of ten pounds of cheese, valued at 32*s.* and 4*d.* The value of the estate is considerable. It was rated at 15½ hides T. R. E. and at 8 hides T. R. W. Its revenue was formerly £16, and £8 at the time of the Survey. The fact that there was no demesne need not astonish us in itself, but in this case it can only mean that there was no arable in demesne, because the Saxon owner actually lived there. In fact, the wica has evidently to be taken as a dairy-farm, and corresponds to the vacaria mentioned in Spersolt² and other places.³

¹ Dd. i. 58 c: (Buckland, Berks) 'Osbernus episcopus tenet in dominio Bocheland de episcopatu suo ut dicit. Uluric chemp T. R. E. ibi mansit. Herdwick appears in a few cases in a sense closely resembling that of berewick. As the berewicks of Roelent were scattered oases of ploughland in the wilderness between Cheshire and Wales, so there were three herdwicks belonging to the Castle of Striguil (Chepstow) in the Gloucestershire portion of the Welsh march. Eight ploughs and 11 half villains are assigned to them, and Roger of Ivry is said to levy 100 shillings¹ from them. In Hertfordshire, Theunge is said to be a herdwick of the manor of Stevenage,² and to be estimated with it. In Berkshire, Northamptonshire, and other counties, we find villages called Hardwick,³ in the same way as there are Bartons which have taken their name from the bertona—the grange. The derivation of 'herdwick' from a settlement of herdsmen, making it the equivalent of vacaria, seems tempting, and I have taken it up myself in a former work,⁴ but I have already shown that the term may be employed sometimes in the sense of an agricultural farm.⁵ At any rate, in the cases collected from Domesday, there is no special indication of pastoral husbandry similar to those connected with the use of vacaria, while the descriptions seem to fit small agricultural farms very well.

CHAPTER III

THE LAND OF THE TENANTS

Thaneland. 1. The first group of tenants to be considered are those who stand outside the fundamental arrangement of the manor, and are only connected with it by special services. Such was the position of the Old English thanes, and of the French knights, to whom portions of estates, or small estates within the range of patronage of the manor, had been ceded. This category of holdings is termed thaneland, and is carefully distinguished, both from *demesne*¹ and from soke.² Let us look at a page of the Exon Domesday describing the 'occupied lands' of Somerset. In the Royal manor of South Petherton two hides have been carved out in Straton, for a certain Merleswain, as thaneland. These had been made to contribute to the farm of the manor, that is, included in its economic arrangements, either as an ordinary tenant's holding, or as part of the demesne. A virgate which had been thaneland in Petherton, and let to athane, is said to be joined to Alfred of Spain's manor of Wolmersdone. Alevardetone and Alnodestone, two estates that had been thaneland, had been made into one manor.³

As a rule, it is expressly insisted upon that these outlying parts were indissolubly connected with the land of some church, or other tenant-in-chief, and could not be separated therefrom.¹ The motive for such remarks is not far to seek; the position of these tenements rendered them particularly liable to be cut off from the lordship. There are cases, however, where the relation was reversed, and the thanelands seem to have been estates attracted by the adjoining manors rather than plots carved out of the manorial territory for a special purpose. What that special purpose was it is not difficult to see—it was thane's service, that is, primarily, military service, with some private sergeanties, perhaps, hanging on to it.² This conception of service forms the basis of a curious dispute between St. Mary of Berkeley and Ralf Piperel. The latter was seised of a hide in Tollesbury, which Siward had held T.R.E., and offered to do service to the Abbey, as his predecessor had done, but the Abbess would not accept the service or grant the tenure, because, as she said, the land was reserved for the sustenance of the church.³ In so far as the service of thanes or knights was military, it was the king's service, and it might be said of an estate that it could not be separated from the Royal service, in the same sense in which other entries speak of an estate or holding being thaneland.¹

Reeveland. Another kind of specially tenanted land is the so-called Reeveland. It is generally exempted from the farm;² although, as a matter of exception, it may be included in it.³ But the exemption is so prevalent that a verdict is passed in the case of Getun, in Herefordshire, stating that, as the estate had been turned into reeveland, from having been thaneland, all the service and rent yielded by it might be considered a loss to the king.⁴ The farm which is referred to in these cases is the king's farm, and it seems pretty clear that reeveland is, properly, land attributed to the sheriff while exercising his duty, in fact, a kind of office-endowment.⁵ We know enough of the career of the sheriffs of those days to suspect that in many cases this official endowment was made the basis of private encroachment.⁶ It seems that the term reeveland was sometimes used also for the holdings reserved to private reeves in their manors.⁷

This means of recompensing them for their services was quite in keeping with the economic manners of the time, and was more easy to provide than a regular salary.

The third kind of tenements of special tenure, about which we get a good deal of information in the Survey, is the tenure of the churches. These are considered a necessary element of every full township organization, and it is with the township and not with the manor that they are directly connected. The parish church is the tun kirke of Old English times, and tenement of a hide or two virgates is of right reserved to it.¹ The spread of the manorial system draws them gradually into the manorial organization.

All parish churches had to contribute to the farm of their manors.² The insufficiency of parochial churches, the rise of private jurisdictions, and the spread of private religious bequests, led to the foundation of many private churches and chapels, which collided, in respect of revenue, with the mother churches of the parishes.³ We need not go into the details of these controversies, and of the sources of ecclesiastical revenue, it will be sufficient to mention the principal of these latter: burial dues, church scot⁴—an impost similar to landgafol, but levied for the benefit of the church—tithes in money or produce,⁵ and assignment of certain strips in the open field.¹ In certain cases local churches were, like some of the famous monasteries, liberated from the payment of all public dues, and their tenure thus converted into frank-almoign.² But in any case, although subject to patronage, and occasionally to exploitation, the township churches and their lands never became the property of the manorial lord in the same way as mills or fisheries.

Their public character was always kept up by the duties of public worship and the connexion with the great corporation of the Church, and therefore the holding of the mass-thane, or priest, though certainly in the manor in one sense, was, at the same time, even more separate from it than its thaneland or reeveland. On the other hand, through his endowment with a common holding, the priest was a regular member of the village community, and it is only natural that he was made to appear as one of its representatives on all occasions when it was called up for police, judicial, or administrative duties; I need not remind the reader of the place and part of the priest by the side of the reeve, and of the representative villains in inquests and local courts.

2. The usual way of drawing income from estates, rights, and privileges was to give them in farm to a bailiff or steward. This was the recognized practice even in regard to income derived from the highest dignities in the realm. We possess, for instance, interesting notices about the farmed dues of the counties of Oxford and Northampton.¹ Both are said to be commutation sums for a farm of 3 nights, and yet Oxfordshire pays £150, and £25 by weight for augmentation, while Northamptonshire pays only £30. The solution of the difficulty seems to be that in the second case the £30 by weight is also augmentation, while the farm of 3 nights is reckoned separately, and either paid in kind or assumed to be known. There is a separate payment of £20 for the borough of Oxford, and £20 for the right of coinage of the Oxford mint. The borough of Northampton pays £30 10s. But this sum goes to the sheriff, and is not included in the farm. A commutation payment is made instead of the feeding of the king's dogs in both cases, and it reaches in Oxfordshire the considerable sum of £24, while in Northamptonshire its amount is even larger, £42. The presentation of a hawk is redeemed in both cases with £10, 20 shillings have to be given instead of a pack-horse, and 20 shillings more are paid in Northants instead of a hunting horse. The queen received 100 shillings of gersuma in Oxfordshire, a custom which does not occur in Northants, where, on the other hand, there is a special account with the farmer in regard to the estates of Queen Edith, the Confessor's widow, which are valued at £40. There is a payment of 4 shillings in Oxfordshire for arms, and 20 shillings in Northants for alms; 6 sesters of honey, and 15 pence as an equivalent of a customary rent in honey, are supplied by Oxfordshire, and do not appear in Northants. The general agreement in both cases is very striking, although there are small variations of local custom. The main point was the commutation of the food-farm into a payment of £50, and the buying-off of the feeding of dogs and other customary dues connected with hunting progresses. Altogether, the stamp of the original arrangement of rents in kind is manifest. A collector, for example the Sheriff, would have to keep an account with the Treasury about the paying-in of the various dues, and to charge remiss taxpayers for the deficient sums. The expression firma might be used in such a case in regard to consolidated customary payments. But there might be also an agreement with a farmer for the whole amount, in which case he would be responsible for the whole sum, and would be left to seek compensation either in a certain percentage ceded to him according to bargain, with eventual remissions in the case of gross deficiencies in the payment of the taxes. This was the method used for the recovery of sums fixed once for all.¹ If, on the contrary, the sums to be rendered were not consolidated, but flowed according to circumstances, as, for example, in the case of proceeds of jurisdiction and fines, the common practice was to farm these proceeds at a lump sum, and to leave the farmer to collect as much as he could in excess—a detestable system, directly inciting to extortions. The references to the farms of Royal rights in Shropshire and in the city of Chester allude to such arrangements.² The term firma may indicate both the income drawn by the king or by a lord from a province, a city, a manor; and the sources of their income. In the first sense we are told, for example, that the king receives £375 in farm from Balduin for the county of Devon, and £108 from Goscelin for the estates of Queen Edith, and £24 from Reginald for the land of Ordulf.¹ In the second we hear that certain estates or sources of income are appropriated to the farm,² or, on the contrary, abstracted from it by officials.³ From this second point of view there may be mention of hides belonging to a particular farm.⁴ It was important to know not only to whom a farm had to be paid, but also in what place it had to be rendered. The customary arrangement and the tendency towards connecting all obligations with real objects, and of turning them as much as possible into real rights, led to the localization of the firma, to the concentration of dues into constant groups attached to certain manorial centres. Such a group was formed, for example, around the Royal manor of Reading in Berkshire.⁵ In consequence of a further extension of the meaning of the term, we find that freemen are sometimes said to be outside any farm, in the sense of being independent of any manorial organization, although doubtless they would be subject to the dues of the hundred and of the shire, thus appertaining to the farm of the hundred or of the county. The great point was that they did not belong to any of the king's manors, and were only under the custody of the sheriff.¹ It must be added that even when freemen were added to the farm of a manor their dues were mostly reckoned up separately from those of the rest of the estates.² In a Herefordshire instance it appears that a manor estimated at 4 hides T.R.W. was not put to farm T.R.E., so that it was not known what its value was at that time. This is hardly to be explained by independence of former holders, but rather by the unsettled condition of the district, which did not admit of a fixation of dues, or of leasing to bailiffs.³

about farm.

In regard to the ways in which farms were disposed of, I should like to refer to two characteristic instances. Oger holds an estate of St. Guthlac in Repinghale. It used to belong to the dominical farm of the monks, and Abbot Ulchel had commended it to farm to Hereward by yearly leases.⁴ This short entry implies a great deal. There was a dispute between the monastery and a lay lord who had seized the land. The estate in question was included in that portion of the monastery's land which was assigned to the use of the monks themselves. 'De dominica firma monachorum' corresponds here to the otherwise common expression 'de victu monachorum', as opposed to the 'terra militum', or 'tainland', the estates conferred on soldiers.

A more complicated story is told in the description of Bergholt in Suffolk. The manor, with the soke of a hundred and a half appertaining to it, rendered in the reign of King Edward £24. To this farm were added two manors in Vert rendering £9. In the reign of King William, Robert Malet had it first, and then Bergholt with all the other items rendered £60 by weight, and £8 by tale as gersuma.¹ Then it came into the hands of Roger Bigod, who asserts that he paid for it, in addition to the price already stated, 40 shillings by tale, and one mark geld. But the sheriff, Aluric de Wanz, who took it over last, maintains that Bigod paid exactly the same sum as Roger Malet. Roger Bigod offers to prove his assertion by the evidence of the men who had entered into agreements with him—his sub-bailiffs. At the time of the Survey the whole complex of estates and rights was held by Aluric for £60 by weight. There was a convention between him and the King that he should render to the King £60 out of the profits of the estates, and he calls the King to warrant that it was so. And he adds that it does not rest with him that he does not render that profit (or Bergholt does not yield such profits).² The case arose evidently out of the jealousy between different bailiffs. The former sheriff, Roger Bigod, boasts of having paid much more to the King than the actual one, Aluric de Wanz, and even on the latter's own showing the farm has declined to some extent. It is much larger, however, than the farm of King Edward's time, and must have involved an increase in all dues within the estates and the hundred, although we do not know in what manner this increase was effected. Its ultimate result was, however, that the paying power of the population was overstrained, and the rents could not be gathered in. The last farmer not only had to give up the supplementary payments, but was not even able to pay the £60 for which he had made a bargain with the King. The form of the bargain must have been an inscription on the rolls of the Exchequer, and not a lease-deed, as the bailiff had to call the King, that is the Royal Exchequer, to warrant, in order to prove his contention. It is not without interest to note, from Roger Bigod's statement, that the bailiffs used to make agreements with sub-bailiffs in order to carry out their undertakings. This appears as a very natural and even necessary expedient when one takes into consideration the enormous transactions and official liabilities of the general bailiffs, who were mostly sheriffs. Three such personages had already followed each other in the administration of Bergholt.

A perplexing instance is presented by the Royal manor of Leominster in Herefordshire.¹ Its rents were computed at £23 2s., besides the profits from eel-fisheries. The manor was at farm for £60, and nuns had some claims in it in respect of provisions.

The Shire gave a verdict that if the manor should be 'delivered' (deliberatum) it could be valued at £120. What is the meaning of 'delivery' in opposition to farm? And why was the farm so much below what the proper estimate turned out to be? Is open competition meant, as likely to raise the income? Or is the estate to be 'delivered' from the farm and the farmer, and taken into direct administration? Or is the delivery to be made to the tenantry of the manor? This last eventuality has more particularly to be taken into account. Documents of the feudal age often show burgesses and even peasants taking over the farm of their city or township.¹ This is the essence of the so-called firma burgi,² an institution which was as advantageous to the Royal administration, or that of other manorial lords, as it was constantly desired by the subject populations themselves. I refrain, however, from suggesting a definite solution of this problem, as the term 'deliberatum' is too vague to admit of more than hypothetical interpretation.

3. A common equivalent of firma is pretium, by which Value. the payment to the owner at which the administration of the estate could be taken over is primarily meant; it assumes, however, sometimes the other subsidiary meanings of firma.³ The redditus or exitus of a manor is, of course, simply its revenue or outgoings,⁴ quite apart from the way in which they were collected, and as such they are generally equivalent to the value (valet), a sum in which the yield of the estates is generally estimated in the Domesday Survey.⁵ But there is another sense in which the revenue (redditus) and the value (valet) do not coincide. The first refers to the actual income drawn from an estate, while the latter is taken in the meaning of a fair and normal estimate of economic capability. Now these two things need not be the same, and were very often not identical in the England of the Conquest. When we hear of a sudden and enormous increase in value, as e.g. in Peterborough, where a value of 20s. is converted into £10, we may suspect a very great change in social conditions, quite apart from extortions of the owners.¹ Again, a rapid economic deterioration may be marked by a great fall in value.² But there are numbers of cases in which the actual income was forced up for a time by oppression and destruction of capital, and in such cases the valet estimation naturally fell below that of the revenue. In Southfleet, Kent, e.g., there is land for 13 ploughs, and there are actually 13 teams, one in demesne and 12 with the tenants. There are 7 serfs, 25 villains, and 9 bordarii. The wood is sufficient to feed 100 pigs. The geld has gone down from 6 sulungs to 5. The value was £11 T. R. E. and has increased T. R. W. to £21. And yet the estate renders a little over £24. The excess of revenue over the normal income is not very great in this case, but is not the less characteristic of the tendency to draw more than the estates could yield under normal circumstances.³ But any number of more sensational instances might be given. Winfarthing in Norfolk was valued at 40 shillings T. R. E., and now (T. R. W.) its valuation has risen to £8 3s. 4d., of which £7 were paid by freemen who had been added to the manor at the Conquest. They were not able to pay such a sum any longer.⁴ In another Norfolk case the value had fallen from £8 T. R. E. to £3 at the Conquest, and had risen again to £8 10s. at the time of the Survey, but this was done 'cum magna pena'.¹ In the two last-named cases the Survey does not try to make a difference between value and revenue, and speaks of value all along, but it is clear that, in point of fact, we have to deal with an actual revenue artificially forced up beyond the normal value of the estate.

It would be, naturally, out of the question to establish a common average of value for the whole of England. But it is interesting to notice that the valet numbers are not taken entirely at random, but that in some districts, at any rate, there is evidently a tendency to bring them to a certain standard. In the midland counties a standard of one pound per hide and ploughland is clearly perceivable.² I say per hide and ploughland, because when numbers disagree strongly in regard to these two terms it is difficult to make out which of the two has to be connected with the normal value, and we have often to fall back on the national estimate, viz. the ploughland (terra carucis). I may add that the common estimate of values is best seen, not in large manors with many complicated elements of dues and services, but in the simpler combinations, where estates are rated at one hide or two and estimated to contain one ploughland or two. It is evident, however, that though, as a rule, small estates presented more or less regular numbers in regard to value, the reason for the irregularity of the larger ones consisted in their complexity and in the wish to appraise profits which did not occur in the case of small economic units.

4. The term 'custom' had a special meaning in Rents. mediaeval speech, namely, it signified a service, or rent, due by custom from one person to another. This conception might be applied to persons of all ranks: a great baron might be called a customer of the king, as he had to perform customary military and court service to him. But in ordinary parlance the term was mostly applied to rural services and rents, with which the lower class was burdened for the benefit of their superiors.¹ The expression was convenient because it enabled men of the time to group all sorts of duties together without being obliged to distinguish very carefully whether these duties were of servile or free origin, and the same may be said about people called consuetudinarii, customers. Their subjection was clearly indicated, and so was the manner by which the quantity and quality of their service was fixed—it was the result of usage, practice, custom. But there was no necessity of drawing the delicate and complicated distinctions between born serfs, freedmen, dependent freemen and so forth. If they were all bound to perform customary duties or to render customary dues, they were all by right deemed ‘customers’.²

I have already had occasion to speak several times of the great arrangements of food-rents known as the farms of one night, or of one day: they were mostly in practice in Royal manors, but similar customs prevailed also in connexion with many ecclesiastical institutions.³ The component elements of the full farm often linger as customary rents when the larger part of it has been commuted for money. We hear of tribute in corn,¹ in honey,² in beer.³ Originally these food-rents were claimed at the progresses of the King or of the lord, in order to provide for the feeding of him and of his retainers on the journey. A curious feature of these progresses, dating from the time when the collection of tribute in kind was independent of the existence of any special hall or house, was the erection of a temporary dwelling for the itinerant potentate, and Domesday still shows traces of this custom, in purely English localities.⁴ The feeding of dogs is another remnant of ancient practices which had struck deep roots in consequence of the extension of hunting privileges and the importance of the hunting retinue.⁵ Next in importance are the presentations of animals—oxen, pigs, sheep—in connexion with herbage and pannage, that is, with payments for the use of pasture.⁶ I need not say that presentations of fish are common in sea-shore districts and wherever fisheries become a valuable asset,⁷ while

Welsh tracts, and districts bordering on Wales, are especially rich in food-rents of Celtic origin. case of moots and rural officers, we have to turn for particulars to later documents, which enable us to draw a complete picture of these arrangements. Gafolearth is sometimes mentioned,¹ however, and so are boonworks,² but the most important labour-service, week-work, is never spoken of except in one case, when it is said that bordarii are doing one day's work in the week.³

*Averagia*⁴—carrying duties—are noticed sometimes, and radmen's service is described⁵ as being according to the lord's wish, evidently not a mark of special servility, but of the fact that these riding messengers and servants could not be assigned definite customary work, but had to take orders according to circumstances. Once a lord's oven (cf. the French four banal) is mentioned in a Hampshire manor.⁶

One special obligation of the dependent peasantry is often spoken of and alluded to, namely, the soca faldæ—the duty of the peasants to send their sheep to the lord's fold.⁷ It is evidently considered as one of the most characteristic incidents of rustic tenure, and often forms a kind of dividing line between the free tenants and their neighbours reduced to a more servile condition, although transitional links are not wanting,¹ as usual, and we read occasionally of socmen subjected to the suit of the fold. This feature is interesting in many ways. It dates from before the Conquest: a charter of Edward the Confessor² combines the fact that a man is fold-worthy—that is, free to send his sheep to a non-manorial fold—with the right and duty to attend the fyrð and to attend moots. Thus subjection or freedom in respect of a manorial privilege is thought to be connected in principle with the political rights of the citizen, if we may use this expression—attendance in the host and in public assemblies. Whether we take the latter to mean merely the courts of the hundred and of the shire, or whether we include township moots as well, the combination with the freedom of the fold remains characteristic. It draws a sharp contrast between the people forming the ancient host and the moot organization of the people, and dependants of lords, who cannot send their cattle where they please. The distinction is not peculiar to the northern and eastern, half-Scandinavian, districts; it occurs in a southern charter, and is worded in a way which gives it the aspect of a universal principle. The frequent references to the suit of the fold in the Domesday Survey, especially when contrasted with the barrenness of the latter in regard to other incidents of rustic tenure, corroborate this general proposition by a number of concrete applications. We find in the case of Reedham,³ Suffolk, that the peasants subject to the lord's fold go to his court, while those free of their fold go to the hundred, and it is tempting to compare this instance with the Fersfield (Feruela) one,¹ in which those who own more than 30 acres go to the hundred, while those who own less are subjected to the manorial soke. Taking these two attempts at classification together, we realize the difficulties of social differentiation in these troubled times, and the methods of drawing the dividing lines; in one case the disability in regard to the fold, in the other the size of the holding, are taken as standards, and it is interesting to see that in the latter case 30 acres—a normal virgate—is taken as the unit marking the line of separation: the virgaters are assumed to be moot-worthy. Another important feature consists in the fact that the suggested use of the fold is eminently an incident of champion farming. Of course, folds are made for sheep in separate homesteads as well as in concentrated townships, but the idea of gathering other people's sheep in one's fold is suggested by a system of combined township cultivation. The point is that the lord's demesne arable gets the benefit of the sheep's manure, and the natural places for it are the open fields of a considerable village before seed-time. In a country of scattered homesteads it would have been impossible or difficult to drive the sheep into the lord's fold every night. The use of the fold for purposes of manuring is especially characteristic of the modes of husbandry in which one part of the soil was reserved as 'infield' for more intensive cultivation. In concentrated villages every holding got its strips in the infield, and the question of the distribution of the returning cattle and sheep for the night became a very burning one.

It may be added that the question of the township fold seems to have played a great part in the arrangement of Danish villages (byer). The forta was a necessary feature of those founded on free soil ; this was a large green in the middle of the township where the cattle were congregated, at night, and from which they started for the pasturages in the morning.¹

I need hardly say rents in money are already quite common in the age of Domesday. They are mainly of three different kinds: gafol,² dues assessed originally as regular money tribute; exceptional payments or presentations³ (gersuma); and payments in commutation of rents in kind.⁴

Cross relations of townships and manors.

5. The fundamental union of the population, for purposes of husbandry and local government, is not the manor but the township. Townships are legally supposed, in the feudal age, to cover the entire territory of the kingdom,⁵ and where they did not exist naturally they had to be formed for the sake of police and justice; but, of course, this last expedient was taken because there was the model of the actual townships to go by, and because these prevailed as a matter of fact. The same fundamental character of the village or township unit is expressed in early records,⁶

and in Domesday by the fact that, when a reference to the local duties and rights is needed, it is generally made to the village or township, and not to the manor.¹ And, as well in the Domesday Inquest as in other cases when an exhaustive inquiry into local conditions is aimed at, the reeve, the priest, and four villagers appear as representatives from each township quite irrespectively of manorial relations and divisions. The four or six villains remain the characteristic delegates of rural population all through the feudal epoch, in the same way as the twelve burgesses were the characteristic delegates of a borough for purposes of local information and administration in the hundred and in the county court.

The existence of the township organization as the basis of society produces a variety of administrative and economic consequences. The vill is rated as a unit to the geld, and the shares of assessment are sometimes distributed among the manors in a complicated way.² The artificial, relatively modern, character of the manorial formation, as compared with that of townships, is forcibly illustrated by the fact that its threads reach across the old provincial divisions of hundreds, and even of counties,³ producing very complicated relations of fiscal and economic dependence. For instance, a Staffordshire manor may attract a number of Derbyshire villis into its sphere of influence.⁴ Berkshire and Oxfordshire,⁵ Bedfordshire and Huntingdonshire,¹ Staffordshire and Gloucestershire,² Worcestershire and Herefordshire,³ overlap each other freely, vills being appraised for the manorial farm in one county and paying geld in another, or dividing their taxes between them. And with the geld the service, that is the fyrð obligation, went in some cases, so that a man might be called to serve in the Huntingdonshire array, although his estate was, as a matter of fact, in Bedfordshire.⁴ Some of these cases may have been the result of encroachments, but they are too common to be all explained in this way: the point is that manorial relations, being to a great extent parts of a comparatively recent military and ecclesiastic superstructure, do not conform with previously established tribal, provincial, and local units,—their net is drawn across the original divisions. The relations between single manors are even more intricate. We have already had occasion to observe what a patchwork was presented by East Anglian manors, in spite of a set policy which endeavoured to make them complete, as estates of $3\frac{1}{2}$, or 4, or 5 hides. The chief means of bringing them to their proper size was to accommodate socmen and freemen to fill the gaps. No wonder that we constantly come across socmen, and occasionally freemen, of the half-Scandinavian districts who live in one township and 'lie' in another—that is, are joined to its economic organization.¹ In the case of burgesses such a double allegiance was especially common.² The position of tenants affected by it must have been very complicated, as we cannot suppose that they were quite liberated from their duties in regard to the locality they were living in, when made to lie in, or to appertain to, another. It is not likely that they could escape, e.g., the duty of catching and keeping thieves, or of helping to trace stolen cattle and fugitive serfs, according to the position of their dwellings, although in all respects touching farm and geld they must have looked to the township to which they appertained as tenants.

Apart from these frequent cases of 'accommodation' of free tenants, the most varied cross relations between manors are to be found in Domesday practice. One carucate out of a batch of four belonging to a certain township may be diverted from its natural dependence and made to lie in a different one.³ One and the same owner may possess two exactly similar estates in the same township, and of these estates one will be diverted to 'lie' in another township.⁴ We cannot tell whether these aberrations are called forth by the history of the estates in question, or by some fiscal or legal expedient which it would be impossible to bring to light nowadays. But what can hardly be contested is the inference that these artificial combinations disclose the composite and recent character of manorial arrangements, stretching over the natural growths of the townships. Manors of this kind are assuredly not organic germs of townships.¹ And although, as I say, it would be quite out of the question to trace all the entangled meshes of these manorial cross relations to their sources, one prolific cause of entanglement may easily be seen in the overlapping of manors and sokes. The manor was mainly an estate, and not necessarily endowed with higher forms of jurisdiction. It had to be supplemented, on the latter side, either by hundreds or by private sokes, radiating from other manorial centres,² and this gave rise to complications by no means peculiar to the Domesday epoch, but clearly apparent, e.g. in the Quo Warranto inquisitions of the close of the thirteenth century.³

But the plain and most usual cause of manorial complications lay in the fact that the manor, being originally a unit of property and not of settlement or husbandry, could stand in all sorts of relations to the organic unit of the township; it could include one or several, but could also share with another manor, or several, the basis of a single township. Quite apart from subinfeudation, which produced well-known results in the parcelling-up of mediaeval estates, they appear, from the very first, in innumerable instances, as fractions of townships. I will just quote a few instances from Derby,¹ Lincoln,² Dorset,³ Devon,⁴ and Wiltshire.⁵

6. The township is not only the fundamental and organic unit of rural organization; it is also sufficient in itself for economic purposes, and may exist without any direct interference of the manor in its affairs. This principle finds expression, in the Domesday Survey, in the fact that there are numbers of settlements described in it in which there is no home-farm, and no hall, so that the husbandry of the place is conducted, not on the principle of combined work, but by the villagers alone. Some of the instances are drawn from small settlements¹ which had just been converted into manorial land out of private estates, and in this case it may have been deemed superfluous to create a separate domanial superstructure. But this is by no means the only case where the villagers are left to themselves. Many of the recorded instances in question concern large townships,² in which economic arrangements must have involved a considerable amount of co-operation and administrative work. The absence of hall and demesne indicates self-governing communities, farming their own dues, an arrangement which can be copiously illustrated from later practice.³ But even if there were no compromise between landlord and tenants in regard to farm, if the latter were under the direct supervision of a reeve, bailiff, or riding sergeant their dependence on the lord may have consisted largely in tribute;⁴ while, on the other hand, it is to be kept in mind that even where there was a distinct demesne it could be let in farm to the villagers. These latter cases are numerous enough,¹ although they form the minority in comparison with those of the more common system of combined husbandry, in which the lord's interest was represented by a distinct home-farm, either with a separate plot allotted to it, or with shares in the open field of the township. But, although what may be called the independent township is the exception at the date of the Survey, still it exists, and it is especially interesting, inasmuch as it presents a simpler, more rudimentary, type than the combined system, corresponding best to the indications as to open-field practices given by the Anglo-Saxon laws,² and connecting itself naturally with the township as one of the fundamental units underlying the manorial organization. The other fundamental unit is the private estate cultivated by slaves or serfs, and the link between this type and the later combined system is presented by the manors consisting exclusively of a home-farm.³ The other pole of development has to be sought in the manors consisting of a township without home-farm, and the inquirer has to attend to both lines of development.

The communalism of the independent township was not hidden from the view of the people who made use of it,⁴ although we cannot expect them to have had a very clear conception of the extent to which a theory of corporate ownership was involved in their proceedings. Without attempting to analyse in too searching a manner these necessarily rudimentary institutions, we cannot pass them by as insignificant features. Although the indications of the Survey consist of a few words, and do not go into any details as to the way in which the rural organization of such townships was carried on, they are precious indeed, because they give documentary evidence of the existence of conditions in which some kind of by-laws, and orders of champion-farming, were needed. People who had to manage the open-field system in communities like Ospringe, Woodchester, the non-domanial adjunct of Tewkesbury, or Oldeby, could not do it unless they entered into agreements, made by-laws, issued orders, and enforced them in some way or another. It is deplorable that no orders or by-laws of these early periods have come down to us, but no more have the directions of reeves or stewards, and it is by the presence of the problem and the conditions in which it is put, together with later indications, that we have to shape our notions in regard to its solution. It is not from the steward that the independent township could have received directions about the rotation of crops, the stocking of the commons, or the customs as to hedges, drains, paths, &c.¹

Boroughs
as agrarian communities.

The management of townships without demesne is the natural stepping-stone to another important variation of social life, namely, to that of cities or boroughs possessed of agricultural land. It is clear that the passage from the town in a rural sense to the town in the urban sense was a very gradual one, and many transitional forms exist in which the features of both types are mixed up.

To begin with, the beginnings of town life, as expressed in a distinct group of burgesses, may be traced in manors which otherwise do not present any peculiarity in their structure. Calne, near Chippingham, Wilts, is not an important place at the present time, while in the Domesday Survey it appears as a considerable estate, heading the list of the Royal manors of the county. The first lines of its description read like one of the many thousands of notices about rural manors; there is land for 29 ploughs; there is land for 8 plough-teams in the lord's demesne, and 8 serfs; there are 37 villains and 78 smaller tenants, and 10 freedmen, with 21 plough-teams between them. But all at once we seem to be switched off on a new track; there are 47 burgesses, 7 mills, &c.¹ In other words, part of the settlement is still going on with its rural husbandry, while for some reason or other a considerable portion of the inhabitants have taken to other pursuits—industry and trade of some kind. Yet both elements of the population are kept together by the same institutions of village administration and manorial supremacy. The burgess and the peasant evidently stood closely together, and it was not difficult to turn one into the other.

On the other hand, in completely urban settlements—walled towns—land was still held by the burgesses for rural purposes. A well-known instance is Oxford, with its Port Meadow, which still keeps up a trail of corporate ownership running from the time before the Conquest. It is expressly stated in the Survey that it was owned by all the burgesses, that is, by the burgesses in common, and that it yielded profits amounting to 6s. 8d. a year.² It was not a singular case in any sense. The Cambridge burgesses were claiming a common pasture appropriated by the Sheriff of Cambridgeshire, and there can be hardly any doubt that they had the right on their side on this occasion. Indeed, we know from later history that there were vast open fields adjoining the city, and cultivated in the same manner as ordinary unenclosed fields belonging to a rural manor.¹ The description of York in the Domesday Survey shows a very large rural establishment connected with the archiepiscopal city—not less than 84 carucates, or approximately ten thousand acres, were included in the common geld of York, and of these only six carucates, or about 700 acres, were held separately by the archbishops. Even those were evidently mixed up with the strips of the burgesses, and cultivated by them in patches (per loca) in consideration of certain payments to the ecclesiastical lord.² To mention one more instance—the rural portion of the town of Derby contained twelve carucates. In this case not all the burgesses of the city shared in the ownership,³ but only forty-one, and the land was partitioned among them, probably in the same way as in York, and on the same principle of open-field holdings which is characteristic of mediaeval rural husbandry.

In the instances quoted we have examples of meadow (Oxford), of wild pasture (Cambridge), and of arable land (York and Derby). Port Meadow, to judge by its name, must have been largely used for making hay, and was kept in defence until Lammas Day in this case, while it stood open as a common for depasturing cattle belonging to the burgesses, or to persons to whom they had rented the use, after the hay had been cut and up to the time in spring when the greensward was put under defence. Grass for hay was very precious in Domesday times, and the meadow may have been distributed among the burgesses by lot, each householder taking his share for one year. This custom obtains even now in villages in the immediate vicinity of Oxford—in Yarnton and Kidlington.⁴ Of course, such customs, as well as the practices of champion-farming on the arable fields of York, Derby, or Nottingham, presuppose not only a strong sense of communal solidarity, to which all forms of private usage have to conform, but also special regulations as to the time of defence, the means of protecting common and individual rights against trespass and encroachment, the modes of apportioning strips, &c. Of the by-laws elaborated by the town-moots we cannot expect to hear in the Survey, but it is important to note that it lays stress on the communal ownership. The combination of this communal ownership with the superior right of the King and of the various lay and ecclesiastical lords interested in the towns and superimposed on some of their burgesses¹ does not appear to me to be different in essence from the combination of communal and manorial rights in the rural townships. The burgesses were more closely knitted together; they were protected by their walls and their economic importance; they were better able to take care of their rights and to resist encroachments of private lords. But at bottom their union was a modification of the union constituted in every rural township, and it is not necessary to look out for a different principle in the organization of their property and husbandry. The real difference consisted in the widely different re-action of the urban and of the rural townships against feudalism: the first succeeded in preserving and consolidating itself in the struggle, while the latter had to submit, and to shape its legal and economic framework according to the scheme of personal tenure and service.

The main points of the section on rural organization Summary. may be summarized under the following heads:—

1. The open-field system is not especially connected either with free villages or with servile villages: it existed in all the varieties of rural settlements, independently of the condition of the peasants.

2. Manorial organization is characterized in the eleventh century by a great variety of types, and cannot be traced to the prevailing influence of a single current of economic development.

3. The older and wider basis of rural life is presented by the township. The manorial organization appears as a later superstructure on this original basis.

4. The rural and the urban township have developed from a common stem, and help to explain one another.

SECTION III: SOCIAL CLASSES

CHAPTER I

LANDOWNERS AND FREE TENANTS

1. IT has been already made clear that the military tenants, who with the ecclesiastical institutions formed the bulk of the privileged classes in the feudal age, had stepped to a great extent into the place occupied before the Conquest by thanes.¹ Indeed, in some cases the same people held the estates from which military service was due both after and before the Conquest,² and groups of 'English thanes'³ survive at the time of the Domesday Survey in all parts of the country as one element of the upper military class which was to rule England during the next centuries. The only question is whether these military tenants of ancient stock would be entered later on as knights or as sergeants.⁴ The tie of service between the thane and his lord was a broader one than that between the feudal lord and his military vassal: it was originally, as we have seen, a general obligation to serve, which was by no means specifically restricted to the attendance in the armed retinue of the lord for a period of six weeks, or other forms of military duty. Suit of court, household attendance, in some cases messenger services and help in hunting, were its material features, some of which are perceivable in the feudal arrangements of military tenure, and do not come exclusively from English, but also from French traditions although the usages of thaneship lay more stress on the general notion of service, while the French practices, at least at the time of the Conquest and after the Conquest, are more strictly military.¹ The peculiar personal service forming the essential condition of land tenure appears, however, clearly enough at the time of King Edward,² and there is no reason to doubt that military attendance in the fyrd, apart from cases of general levies, was an essential part of it.³

vassalage.

To the class of thanes in England, vassals and ministeriales would correspond on the Continent, and it is important to realize that the tie of personal service formed the basis of their condition, because this fundamental notion will help us to unravel some of the otherwise puzzling features of terminology and usage attending their position in the Survey. Free land tenure, for one—that is, a form of land-holding which enabled the tenant to go with his land where he pleased, to sell and give it as he pleased—was an incident commonly connected with thaneship, but not necessarily derived from it, and not essential for the status of a thane.

Edwardus ii hidas ad geldum. Terra iii carucis. Ibi fuerunt viii taini habentes sub rege sacam et socam, hanc terram tenuit Eustachius, et modo est in manu regis, et ibi sunt viii homines, et sub eis vii bordarii cum iii carucis.'

Land was the reward and the usual material equipment for service in those days: it would have been unfair and impossible to keep the allegiance and actual help of thanes as serving-men unless they were recompensed in some way, and unless they had some means to provide for their sustenance and expenses. Therefore the feoffment of land followed as a matter of course, and the more complete and advantageous this feoffment was the more it was appreciated, and the better it corresponded to the idea of recompense for faithful and efficient service. Naturally enough we find, therefore, that the best-endowed and most privileged land-owners of Old English society turn out to be thanes, and have received their endowments as grants for service. We may trace thaneship as a constitutive element in the condition of the alodiarii,¹ the owners who have their lands as fully at their disposal as was possible in those days; and another form of land tenure, also described as essentially free, that of the tenants *in parage*² is besides intimately connected with thaneship. But the privileged quality of the land tenure was not a direct and necessary result of thaneship, nor the condition of a thane a direct consequence of privileged land-holding. By the side of thanes who could go with their land where they pleased and could do with it what they pleased,¹ who thus enjoyed full liberty in regard to commendation and possessed bôcland, stand other thanes who could not separate their land from some particular estate, or could not leave, with it, the patronage of the king, or of the Church, or of some great man.² In the latter case, the tenement of the thane was considered as the property of his lord, as a portion of an estate which had to 'defend' the whole of it in respect of military obligations. This was the reason why the Domesday Commissioners took the fact that a man lived on thaneland which could not be separated from the lord's estate, as an indication that the tenement had to pass under the lordship of the successor of the Saxon lord; while independent estates belonging to thanes did not, as a matter of course, follow their holders' allegiance. A characteristic consequence of the quality of thaneland was that, as a rule, it was estimated for geld with the estate on which it depended.³ On the contrary, thanes holding bôcland were in truth only personally subjected to certain obligations in regard to the lord.¹ They could discard him if they found his protection no adequate equivalent for their service, and, at any rate, their land endowment was by right in no way implicated in the estate of the lord.² The cases under discussion, besides their direct significance in Old English law, are characteristic for the use and meaning of the expressions 'freedom', 'free'. These expressions admit of divers constructions, and are very wide in their application, but in one of the most prevalent senses given to them they have nothing to do with freedom of status or of personal condition. They are used to denote that a person can dispose of the property in land that he holds, land which belongs properly to him and not to somebody else.³ The contrast between the forms of land-holding in question might, indeed, be illustrated to some extent by a comparison with the modern distinction between freehold and leasehold.

Certain peculiarities of Old English law account for a good deal in the history of thaneship. It inclined decidedly to the notion that all the sons of a man should be given equal rights in his succession. This view subordinates the interests of efficient husbandry and service to the natural growth of population, and the result must always be a multiplication of rights impairing the value of estates, parcelling them up into small fractions, either by real partition or by dependence on too great a number of tenants. The personal character of thaneship expressed itself, among other things, in the absolute character of inherited rights springing from it. Although there were definite standards of efficiency in regard to estates intended to serve as a basis for military service, although it would have been advantageous from a public point of view to keep them up as close units of $3\frac{1}{2}$ –5 hides or carucates, as a matter of fact we find, especially on bócland estates, the most luxuriant growth of parage tenures, with 8, 9, 10, 14 tenants for each estate,¹ which in itself is sometimes by no means a large one. The movement towards the concentration of estates assumed an overwhelming force directly after the Conquest in the development of French military tenure.

Thaneship as a condition of vassalage, or personal service of a higher kind, was not restricted to the following of the King. Great personalities—queens, earls, bishops—had their thanes as well as the King,² and in strict terminology the King's thanes, with their large wergeld and extensive rights, were carefully held apart from ordinary thanes.¹ And yet we mostly read of thanes in Domesday without any qualifying adjunct, and have, if possible, to determine in every particular case whether the persons in question are tenants-in-chief or under-tenants; personal attendants of the king, or of some private person. The fact that thanes, as such, occupy such a prominent place in Domesday must be explained by some feature common to all, and there is only one such feature—they are all armed servants, their first and most important duty is to assist the lord in the performance of military duties charged to the estate; as predecessors of the feudal milites they are all thanes, the highest as well as the lowest, and stand in sharp opposition to all classes not subjected to special military obligations.

This is very characteristic in the case of small thanes, of whom there is a great number everywhere. Holders of a ploughland, or of fractions of a ploughland, are constantly described as thanes, and it is certainly not the size, but the quality of their tenement and the nature of their service, that give them the right to such a personal distinction. The well-known instance of the Lancashire thanes is worth notice in this respect. These thanes, and the drengs, or homines corresponding to them, hold estates of one ploughland and less; they have to perform boon-works and ploughings on the King's manorial home-farms, and these agricultural services are emphatically described as being alike to those of villains. The services in question are not numerous or burdensome, but they speak of a subjection which suggests a comparison with downright villains, and imply rustic arrangements in the households of the thanes themselves.² They were evidently, for all purposes, peasants with medium-sized holdings. The lord exercised very stringent rights of relief in cases of succession; and the expressions used by the Survey about the passing of inheritance imply that the system of united holdings prevailed there, and not parage or gavelkind succession.¹ And yet all the terms used to denote the condition of these tenants—thanes, drengs, homines—distinguish them from the ordinary peasantry, and the stress laid on the organization of justice and the attendance at folk-moots shows these men to have been eminently ‘moot-worthy’. There can be no doubt about the condition of these independent freemen: they are ‘statesmen’, farmers, and warriors at the same time. Their very independent position does not exclude an element of strongly expressed vassalage: they are subjected to rules of a distinctly feudal character, and their tenements are liable to confiscation for grave breaches of the obligations resulting from such vassalage.

It need hardly be mentioned that the Conquest, with its wholesale destruction of the English military class, the destruction of property, and the deeds of violence brought about in its sequel, lowered in every direction the position of thanes. We often notice their disappearance, and can readily suspect that they have been replaced by peasants—socmen or villains.² In other instances, although they keep their ground, there is very little left to testify of their importance in better times.¹ Indeed, it is almost a wonder that so many traces should have still been left in the Domesday Survey as to their position and rights.

2. We have already had occasion to deal with one meaning Alodiarii. of the term liber, free. It is also often used synonymously with thane, or as a qualification to it, marking off one species of the genus, namely, the thanes sitting on their own land, and free to go with their land where they pleased.² We would sometimes recognize members of the same group even where the word thane is omitted, as 'free English',³ or alodiarii,⁴ or 'tenants in parage'.⁵ But as these terms were of local application and not determined by an unalterable law, in the case of alodiarus—the free tenant holding in alod—it is not absolutely necessary to suppose that the term always meant exactly thanes owning land with full right to dispose of it, owning bócland in fact, or its equivalent. Some of the local jurors actually spoke of alodiarii who were unable to recede, and therefore were not quite free in their rights of ownership.⁶ And, what is even more characteristic, the term alodiarii, which, as a rule, carries the meaning of as full an ownership as could exist in those times, has been applied exceptionally to people who can hardly be described as thanes, in whose position no element of vassalage is discernible. In the description of the Surrey manor of Codinton,¹ for instance, we read that it defended itself to the geld for 30 hides, of which the earl (Lewin) had twenty, while ten were held by the alodiarii of the township, who could go with their land where they pleased. The connexion with the township is the main feature in the status of this particular set of alodiarii, and it is much more probable to see in them small independent freeholders of the township than thanes. Indeed, this case makes it clear that the expression alodiarii used without further qualification applies chiefly to persons whose condition was characterized by their freehold, thanes forming only one part of the social group. This is borne out by the shades in the application of the right to sell and to go with the land—two rights intimately connected with each other. Between the extreme cases of those who could sell to whomsoever they pleased, and of those who held land belonging to ecclesiastical or secular lordships,² we find curious intermediate positions which it would be difficult to rubricate in either category. There are those who have the right to sell to strangers, if they have first offered their land to their lord.¹ There are other freemen who are said to be unable to sell unless they pay a tax of 2 shillings.² As a consequence of these variations of meaning, we find that of several freemen (liberi) living in one place some are said to possess the right to sell and to give while others in the same group are deprived of it.³

3. Another interesting group of cases is presented by the use of the term terra libera, free land, or free tenement. It may occur in a general sense, without any qualifications disclosing the character of the freedom or franchise claimed.⁴ But there are a sufficient number of instances showing that this freedom was taken to mean, as regards land, either freedom from some kind of pecuniary duty,⁵ or freedom to give and to sell.⁶ A curious attempt is made once to represent free tenure as necessarily a tenure in capite. Orgar held four hides in Berwick, Oxon, and one hide in Ganguluesdene, of Milo Crispin. The notice as to these places ends with the remark that the two tenements or estates ought to have been held of the King, as Orgar, as well as his father and uncle, held freely in the time of King Edward.¹ This may have two meanings; either all the lands which were held as bôcland were assumed to depend directly on the King, so that the licence to sell was at the same time the proof of a direct connexion between the King and the alodiaris, or else we have to fall back on a more general use of the term free tenant (tenens libere), which would be applied to all those who were suitors of the county and of the hundred courts. It seems to me that in the case under discussion we have to choose the first eventuality. The instances of free tenants holding of great men and of churches are so frequent that it would have been impossible to contest the title of all the lords of free mesne tenants. On the other hand, bôcland ownership, although often in the hands of mesne tenants in the time after the Conquest, was properly an alodial holding T. R. E., and therefore directly under the king, under whatever obligations the owner may have otherwise stood as to other lords.

homines.

But, undoubtedly, the expressions 'free' and 'freeman' (liberi, liberi homines), when used by themselves, without direct reference to landownership, are primarily meant to denote status or condition—the condition of the free suitors of county and hundred. Let us take a rather intricate Essex case to start with. It occurs in the survey of the estates of Hugh de Montfort. A tenant of his, Hugh,

son of Mauger, holds Goldhanger.¹ The home manor gelds for 1 hide and 15 acres, and contains only half a plough-team (T. R. E. one full team), with one villain, 6 bordarii, and 4 serfs. Besides, there lived in the place 9 freemen (liberi homines), with land rated at half a hide, and a 'man thane' (homo teignus—a vassal thane?) had 30 acres, and two other freemen 10 acres. The same Hugh, son of Mauger, had accepted (taken, or received?) 15 acres from a free thane (de uno franco theigno) and annexed them to his land, but he had no warrant for this according to the testimony of the hundred. The expression liberi homines is used here distinctly for very small tenants who had nothing to do with thanage. On the other hand, a thane occurs in the place as frank thane, and it seems, if the wording is not too clumsy for such an interpretation, that this frank thane is distinguished from the man thane, or vassal thane, spoken of before.² However this may be, the term liberi homines is applied, in our case, without reference to the right to give and sell land, although the franchise of the thane may have consisted in this right. We thus come across the trace of a very numerous class in the East of England which stands distinctly apart from the thanes, and gets its distinctive character from personal freedom and not from any freehold.

to the francus teignus of the above-mentioned Essex instance, the freedom or franchise being applied to the relation between the landowner and his lord: the first was not a mere dependant of the second, sitting on thaneland, but a free follower possessed of bôcland, as I should like to construe it in these cases, and in all others where liberi homines appear as T. R. E. landowners.¹ These latter instances are frequent, and the designation liberi homines might in all of them be easily altered into that of thanes. Not so in the not less frequent cases where liberi homines appear as tenants of an estate along with the priest, the reeve, villains, and bordarii.² In these the stress evidently lies on the personal condition of the holders. When we find in the Hertfordshire manor of Berlai that there were $1\frac{1}{2}$ hides in demesne, with 6 bordarii and 2 serui, and that the tenantry consisted of eight freemen (liberi homines), we cannot explain the entry on the supposition that the freemen were landowners who could go with their land where they pleased: it seems that the rustics of this particular place were free ceorls who enjoyed full folk-right, and could even defend it as against the Abbey of Ketteris, which held the manor.³ An attempt may even be made to distinguish between the ordinary tenants of an estate and the freemen settled on it, as is the case, e. g., in the Northamptonshire manor of Byfield.⁴

Another group of entries concerning freemen is formed by mentions of such as were added to a neighbouring manor at the Conquest or a little before it. They are often marked off from the rest of the manor by their special assessment to the geld.¹ The source from which these freemen come is easy to trace: they are free suitors of the hundred who have been passed by the King into the custody of the sheriff or of some great landowner.² All these subdivisions of the class are especially strongly represented in the counties where Danish influence was powerful. We find there large numbers of free landowners,³ of freemen attached to neighbouring estates,⁴ and of small rustic tenants entered as liberi homines.⁵ In most of these cases the persons mentioned are very small people, and certainly had to perform rustic work with their own hands and the help of their families. The remarkable congestion of these small freemen in Danish districts, both in small farms or hamlets and in large villages, has evidently to be explained by the recent Danish conquest, which introduced large numbers of warriors of the here, who had after the settlement to provide their own subsistence, and who, although very much lowered by their humble condition and scanty outfit, were still proud of their freedom, and able to keep it up. It is not to be wondered at that the freeman appears in the half-Danish counties as a substitute for the thane of the English counties, but it must not be overlooked that, in another sense, he corresponds also, from an economic point of view, to the villain of the English counties. Whatever the gulf between these two classes from the point of view of later feudal law may have been, they stood very close to one another in the east of England in point of husbandry, and it was easy to glide down from one to the other, especially as there were many intermediate links between the two, as we shall have to notice by and by.

Freemen and villains.

A most interesting passage of the Worcester survey shows to what extent the social basis of the position occupied by the freemen in the east and the villains descended from free ceorls in the west was identical. I mean the entry as to the respective rights of the churches of Pershore, Westminster, and Evesham.¹ The shire gave evidence that the church of Pershore ought to have church rent from 300 hides, that is, one load of corn at Martinmas, from every hide in which a franklin (francus homo) is settled, and if he has more than one hide let the rest be free; if there is a breach in the performance of this duty, at the appointed day the person who has kept back the corn ought to render eleven times as much after having acquitted himself of his due. The Abbot of Pershore has forfeiture from his hundred hides, such as he ought to have from his own land. From the other two hundred hides the Abbot has the load and the acquittal due, while the Abbot of Westminster has forfeiture on his own land (because it is his own land), and the Abbot of Evesham has the same from his own land, and all other landlords in the same way. There are few passages in Domesday so replete with information as this. We see the three hundreds in question subdivided in regard to the forfeiture fines, and presumably as to sac and soc, between the great churches of Pershore, Westminster, Evesham, and other great landowners, Pershore wielding the franchise over a full hundred. The distribution of sac and soc follows landownership, but in this particular case landownership, or dominium, as we might say, using a Roman legal expression, is not anything else but a landlordship—the power of the landrica or landhla-ford—and goes well with different kinds of subordinate landholding. As to the ancient right of levying churchscot, Pershore possesses a monopoly, evidently going back to a Royal grant not shared by the other ecclesiastical institutions interested in the district. The repartition of churchscot is very characteristic; it is imposed on the hides, and it is assumed that these hides are normally held by franklins, every one being possessed of one hide or more. The exemption of the extra hides in a franklin's possession supposes two things—firstly, that the tax was levied from the free households as such, and secondly, that the accumulation of several hides in one free household was an exception at the time when the tax arose. Anyhow, we see clearly the framework of ancient English society in the west underlying the superstructure of the landlordships which towers over it. It is composed of households of the size of one hide on the average grouped into hundreds, and the heads of these households are reputed franklins; they are, in a sense, liberi homines, like their fellows in the east of England. And yet, if from this verdict of the county we turn to the survey of the very hundreds mentioned, we shall not find any group marked off in the same way as the freemen of the half-Danish districts, but almost exclusively villains with no particular claim to a special standing. We are thus reminded that the franklin population, the fyrd-worthy, moot-worthy, and fold-worthy tenants, constitutes one of the elements of villainage. If we look out for English and Scandinavian terms corresponding to the liberi and franci homines used by Domesday, the only ones that could be applied would be ceorl, twyhyndman and frigman. Bonde would hardly do as a distinctive term, because it assumes at a very early period on English soil a tinge of bondage.¹ Twelvehyndman and thane would apply to the higher groups of the same general class, but we have no means of judging how far the equality of wergeld between all Danish freemen and English twelvehyndmen, stipulated in the tenth-century treaties, was kept up later on.

Standard
cases.

4. Before leaving this subject I should like to call attention to a few standard cases, illustrating, in a concrete way, the use of the term liberi homines in the eastern counties. Halstead,² Essex, assessed to the geld at 2 hides less 4 acres, and held by William de Gare, a tenant of William de Warenne, had been at the time of King Edward in the possession of 30 freemen. The manor was cultivated at both periods by ten ploughs in demesne and three ploughs belonging to tenants. At the time of the Survey there were 8 villains, 23 bordarii, and 6 serfs settled there, but the repartition of the teams between demesne and tenant holdings, kept up from the time before the Conquest, and the entire disappearance of freemen after the Conquest, show that only a small number of the later tenants had occupied the same rank T. R. E. : most of the earlier freemen had evidently lost caste through the Conquest and had slipped into the position of villains and bordarii. Reverting to the T. R. E. state of things, as indicated by the great number of free landowners and the marked predominance of demesne cultivation, it is not difficult to see that there had been in the township a considerable cluster of small freeholders cultivating their own land and having a few bondmen under them, who,

² Dd. ii. 37 a : (Halstead, Essex) 'In Haltesteda tenet Willelmus de Gare ii hidas iiii acris minus quas tenuerunt xxx liberi homines t.r.e. however, were certainly too few to feed them by their work. It is worthy of notice that the value of the estate increased as a result of the subjection of the freeholders; from £10 a year it rose to £14 17s. 4d. The French knight drew a better income from his dependents than the small freemen had been able to do. A somewhat similar case is presented by Huntingfield, Suffolk,¹ where, however, two sets of freemen are clearly 'distinguished, one, larger, 21 in number with two bordarii under them, who have been drawn into the manor of Robert Malet, and another, of four, whose sac and soc still remained in Blideburgh, a Royal manor, for the benefit of the king and the earl, which means, of course, that the public rights of these latter tenants were still kept up.

Nayland, in Essex,² consisted of two parts: a manorialized estate of 5½ hides with 18 villains, 42 bordarii (formerly 33), and 7 serfs, and a free settlement of 3 hides with 37 liberi homines under the lordship of Sweyn, formerly under Robert. From these, one freeman with 7½ acres is distinguished, who could go wherever he pleased; his land had lapsed into Sweyn's hand. The rustic character of the free settlement cannot be doubted, and it is very probable that it represented a group of free peasants closely connected in all husbandry arrangements with the villains and bordarii of Sweyn living in the same township, yet distinct from them in regard to personal status and legal right as to their holdings.

Hepworth,¹ Suffolk, may stand as an example of a large number of villages within the lordship of Bury St. Edmunds. It was a settlement of 20 freemen, assessed at 2½ carucates, who had 3 villains and 4 serfs under them. There is no distinction between home-farm and tenant-land in this case, the cultivation evidently going on in the same way on the holdings of the free and of the villains. The freemen could give and sell their land, but sac and soc, and commendation and some customary dues not further specified, remained in the monastery; the services accruing from these free tenants had to be rendered in the abbatial manors of Stanton and 'Cunegaston'. Similar conditions prevail in a number of other Suffolk townships subjected to the great abbey.

In the same county of Suffolk we find in the survey of the estates of Roger of Poitou² evidence of another change in the status of liberi homines in Domesday—namely, the gradual subjugation of small squires and scattered farms. A good many of these were encroached upon by the Norman lord, who took advantage of his position as a sheriff, notwithstanding the protection of the church of Ely.

Already, from the examples quoted hitherto, it can be gathered that the quality of freemen did not exclude subjection of various kinds. In a sense, every ordinary freeman was subjected to socage, but originally it was the socage of the king, and of the earl as the local potentate.¹ By the side of these there appear, however, the freemen owing suit and subjected to the jurisdiction of private lords.² Commendation comes in as a second and lesser degree of dependence, and it is especially to commendation and socage that the curious instances apply when the record speaks of entire freemen and half-freemen. The terms 'complete' or 'entire', and the partition of a person, can hardly apply to condition in these cases. In what sense could one speak of a half-free condition as distinguished from that of the socman and the villain? On the other hand, there was sufficient ground to talk of the possession of half a freeman, if a lord could only claim half of the dues from him, either because he had to divide them with some other private lord, or because they remained for one half a source of public revenue.³

Another important feature of subjection was the suit to the lord's fold. Indeed, as we have seen, it is sometimes treated as the dividing line between free and unfree tenants.¹ But in a number of other instances from East Anglia the suit to the fold appears only as an incident, not incompatible with free tenement.² Some of the great communities of freemen acknowledging the lordship of St. Edmundsbury in Suffolk, although emphatically free, are bound to send their sheep to the abbot's folds, and customary service (consuetudines) appears closely connected with this duty.³ It is so in East Anglia, but, as has been already suggested, the soc of the fold, appearing, as it does, as an incident of base tenure, must have played a decisive part in marking the social division between freemen and villains. The aggregate of dues and obligations of different kinds which may be drawn by a lord from his free tenants forms the service of the latter and is assigned to some manor.⁴

The Domesday Survey, with its two lines of entries representing the state of things before and after the Conquest, not only enables us to notice the variations of social condition within the class of freemen to be explained by a process of subjection to lordship, but gives direct and copious evidence as to the gradual stages of the process. There can be no doubt about its general direction. The number of freemen steadily decreases, and their position gets worse.¹ An apparent increase in some cases² is evidently obtained by the annexation to some private manor of freemen who used to belong to Royal hundreds.³ The absorption of free holdings by manors is mostly achieved in one of two ways. Domesday is full of notices of encroachments or invasions, weak freemen being reduced to subjection by the strong hand of their powerful neighbours.⁴ The formation of manors becomes from this point of view a kind of social integration—the swallowing up of small units unfit for the political struggle by more resisting and aggressive units. Undoubtedly the Conquest, with its violence, its racial collisions, its wholesale expropriation, presented an epoch when this process of aristocratic integration must have made itself felt with especial effect.

grants.

5. But another side of the same process is perhaps even more interesting to watch, and may have had even more extensive results, because it went on with great force a long time before the Conquest. I mean the granting away of freemen—of rights over free citizens, as we should say—by the king and other persons in authority. We read of sheriffs appropriating rights over freemen,¹ or ‘accommodating’ freemen² to some lordship. In a way, these cases would fall under the head of violent encroachment, but it must not be forgotten that the sheriffs act in such cases as representatives of the king, and that what they give away is authority over members of the hundreds and dues to be collected from them.³ A stricter and more burdensome subjection may grow out of these forms of appropriation, but the original root is the transfer of part of the Royal authority and of Royal income. And this aspect comes even more forcibly to the fore when freemen are said to be granted directly by the king. A notion has to be realized which is very alien to our present conceptions of public law, but which runs through the whole history of the earlier Middle Ages. The authority of the king over freemen is conceived as a regality, a profitable regality, which may be the object of a grant, and, as a matter of fact, is constantly

put into currency in order to acquit debt, fit out servants, recompense for services, &c. The Domesday references are clear and varied as to this point. Eustache de Boulogne has stepped into the rights of Orgar, a liber homo in Anmere in Norfolk. On this hand he gets 2 carucates, with one villain, 6 bordarii, and 4 serfs. But he has also manorial lordship over six freemen, possessed of one carucate with 2 bordarii. These he claims as granted by the King.¹

There was a dispute in Suffolk² between Roger Bigod the sheriff and Hugh the earl in regard to their respective rights over manors and freemen, but a temporary arrangement seems to have been negotiated between them. In the case of a freeman and priest named Suarinus an intricate question arose, however. He held a small estate of 30 acres to the geld, one plough-team, and 2 bordarii, and Walter of Dol was seised of him, and Earl Hugh 'after him'. The seisin of the latter was challenged, evidently by Roger Bigod, and evidence was produced in regard to the livery from which it was derived. A certain Normannus appeared as a 'liberator'. He averred that he had received a writ from the king that he should put Ralph de Savigny into seisin of all the freemen of whom Hubert de Port had formerly seised the Bishop of Bayeux, and therefore he put Ralph into seisin of the priest Suarinus aforesaid, but he had to admit that he did not know whether Suarinus did belong to those freemen of whom Hubert de Port had seised the bishop. The king's barons—that is, the Domesday Commissioners—when they came into the county, found this to be true in regard to the arrangement between Roger Bigod, who in this case represents the succession of the bishop, and probably claimed Suarinus as forfeited to the king and Earl Hugh. The case is summed up in the words: 'Let this remain in peace (as in the arrangement) until he (Roger?) has made good his claim.' Some points of this case and of the interpretation I give to it may be obscure and disputable, but the chief point of interest is clear enough. We hear of two acts of delivery of seisin as to freemen effected by Royal sergeants in behalf of the king, and constituting a title to which any claim in respect of these freemen has to go back.

The church of St. Mary of Barking¹ is possessed of different estates in Essex, and, among others, holds 6 freemen in connexion with the manor of Muching, who are said to belong to the hundred. They are free as to the abbey, but the king can do with them what he pleases.

Roger Bigod had appropriated a large number of freemen in Norfolk. Among others there were some in Repps, Bastwick, and Somerton, whom he claimed as the successor of an Englishman, Alwin of Thetford, asserting that the king (Edward the Confessor?) had granted them to the said Alwin with their lands.²

If we look back from these Domesday instances to Old English charters, we shall at once perceive that there is an intimate connexion between the two groups of evidence. The hides, with tributarii, cassati, manentes, which form the object of Royal grants in the time before the Conquest, were not necessarily occupied by freemen, but they might be so, and there was nothing in the condition of gafol-gelders or men under soke to enable the courts to draw a line between the ceorls sitting on gafol land, or the socmen and the freemen of higher degree and greater independence. In fact, in the light of the Worcestershire verdict as to the three hundreds of Pershore, the typical occupants of the hides at any rate should be franklins. I will not press this argument further, as I have no wish to demonstrate that free ceorls alone formed the bulk of the peasantry, and that holdings similar to theirs were never settled with bondmen and serfs. What I want to make clear is the trail of evidence which shows the gradual absorption of free settlers and warriors by aristocratic formations, a process which was met half-way by another wave of social evolution—the gradual rising of serfs and slaves to the position of dependent householders.

One great difficulty has to be met at the very threshold of such a theory. Even granted that the ideas of the time were so confused as to permit of the transfer of the regalities we have been talking of, how can it be explained that private citizens were subjected to the sway and exploitation of other private citizens? To what extent could they be considered to be free when brought under such private authority? Now it is important to notice that the intention of keeping up the status, rights of possession, and fixed dues of the free ceorls in the same condition as before the grant, is distinctly traceable both before and after the Conquest. In Old English law, the connexion of the free tenant with the hundred and the county courts did not cease because he was placed under a lordship or granted with his land. We even get a few extremely valuable and direct allusions to the wish to keep up the status of transferred tributaries in exactly the same manner as when they were under the king.¹ Now, after the Conquest, a corresponding doctrine is the well-known teaching as to the immutability of ancient demesne condition. This condition was traced to the time of Edward the Confessor, because as to earlier times 'memory did not run', but the main point of it was that the Royal grant should not change the tenure and status of the people granted, and that the Royal courts should see that it should not be otherwise. This involved the fundamental contrast between the jurisdictional rights of villain socmen and villains, on which we need not dwell at length here, as the subject has been sufficiently discussed in another work.¹ From our present point of view it is material that the doctrine of ancient demesne covers the cases of small rustic tenants, who otherwise would have lapsed into the same rightless condition as ordinary villains, but were rescued from it by the view that tenants granted by the king should not deteriorate in their condition. The people who availed themselves of the ancient demesne privilege were chiefly peasants of a rather low standing, as the acknowledged free socmen and free tenants naturally took to the ordinary processes of Common Law in vindicating their rights. But there is no reason to doubt that many of the people who had to use the parvum breve de recto or the monstraverunt came substantially from the same stock as the granted freemen of the abbeys of Pershore, of Abingdon, of Peterborough, &c., and in this case their appeal rested on the broad ground of immutability of custom on Royal manors. In conclusion, I have to remind the reader that the population attached to these Royal manors consisted largely of free suitors of the public courts who had been annexed to some manor for protection and registration. In their case the transfer was meant to be a jurisdictional one in the main, but it must have carried some customary dues and services along with it.

It is hardly needful to say that, in practice, the fixity of tenure and customs aimed at by the doctrine as to the transfer of Royal rights was constantly infringed and set at nought. As a matter of fact the deterioration of the social status of freemen was much greater than legal theory would admit or suppose. But, for tracing the history of English aristocracy, it is very material to notice that it starts, in one sense, from a dispersion of the regality inherent in the public authority of the king over freemen.

PEASANTS

1. IT is not easy to draw the line between freemen and socmen. They constantly interchange in the East-Anglian shires. In Norfolk their numbers are about equal; in Suffolk the freemen predominate, but socmen occur also in a certain number of instances.¹ In a general way, the term freeman marks the higher condition,² but it may come to pass that a socman has freemen under him.³ One of the reasons for the confusion, behind which there must, however, lurk real differences, is the variety of local usage; the same term may have been understood with different shades of meaning in places situated close by each other. This is not all, however, and some distinctions may be traced. To begin with, there is an opposition between socemanni liberi and non liberi, which widens into that between socemanni as such and liberi homines, on the basis of the right to dispose of one's land.¹ This right is considered, as we know, as an attribute of a free tenement, while it may be said of a less-favoured tenant that he was to that degree socman that he could not dispose of his land.² The category of free socmen would in this Domesday sense comprise exceptionally privileged socmen, endowed with full power over their land.³ As the ordinary socman is bereft of such a right, he is said to belong to an estate, while the typical free tenant is 'added to' an estate, and, as such, stands outside. The socman, being as a rule implicated in the economic management of the estate, is more burdened with service and customary dues, although some dues of the latter kind may fall upon the freeman as well.¹ Ultimately the central notion in the socman's position is his subjection to soke. Freemen are also mentioned in connexion with soke, but when it comes to a distinction between socmen and free tenants or freemen, stress will be laid on the condition of the socman as subject to jurisdictional authority.² Some Suffolk cases are well in point to illustrate the general opposition and the relative character of the distinction between liberi homines and socmen. In Northbery, a manor of Roger of Poitou, there lived a certain priest Edwin, who was socman of the Abbot of Ely, and held 30 geldable acres, with a team, as a manor. To this estate were added 49 freemen with 10 teams; they were all dependent on the Abbot of Ely, both in regard to soke and to commendation, but one among them was entirely (omnino) a socman of the Abbot. The commentary to this significant 'entirely' is presented by an Elmeswell entry which gives five socmen as entirely belonging to St. Edmund—they were unable either to give or to sell without his consent.¹ In Cambas, a manor of Robert Malet, socmen take the place of freemen at the time of Count Bryan, Robert's 'antecessor', and the material side of this change of terms consists in the cutting off of the population from its former parish and from the hundred.² Again and again the full subjection of the tenant in regard to his land³ is coupled with the soke, and one can easily understand that the free peasant, who could not leave the land, nor dispose of it, was in an entirely different position, in respect of the lord, from those who could give or sell, and thus get rid of a situation which became burdensome or unbearable. If these latter are still termed socmen sometimes, the difference between them and the bulk of their fellows is carefully noticed,¹ and I suppose that when we hear of a socman, without further qualification, we ought primarily to think of one who could not recede with his land, and thus, notwithstanding his personally free condition and his public rights, was nevertheless actually a 'colonus ascribed to the glebe', to use the Roman term. One of the natural consequences of this adscription to the glebe was the subjection to economic exploitation on the part of the landlord, and this is noticed in Domesday, from the point of view of the suit of the fold, which is commonly connected with the jurisdictional suit, although, at first sight, it has nothing to do with it.² Indeed, we come across expressions which lead to the conclusion that, at least in the mind of some jurors, the socman was the typical suitor of the lord's fold.³ To sum up, it seems that in a general way the difference between the freeman and the socman amounted to that between a landowner or a contractual tenant on the one hand, and a free peasant attached to a township under lordship on the other. In drawing these general lines I do not wish to dogmatize. The common law of these relations was far from settled, and far from clear in the minds of the people of the day; the local verdicts contain many contradictions and riddles which it would be impossible to unravel,⁴ and we must be content with putting the principal distinctions into a strong light.

Stamford there were 77 socmen house-owners who held their land in demesne, and could seek their lords where they pleased, and the King had nothing to claim from them but forfeiture fines, heriots, and toll.¹ These men of Stamford were in a specially privileged condition, but even they had to pay heriot, which is an acknowledgement that they had to redeem their chattels from their lord the King on entering into succession. In a number of cases they appear as rent- or tribute-paying tenants, their services in kind having probably been commuted for certain payments.² Indeed, it would be difficult to draw a line between them and the censores mentioned sometimes in the Scandinavian district. The difference must have consisted in the greater stability of the arrangement in the case of the socmen.³ Most socmen were subjected to lighter work and smaller rents in kind than the villains. They had chiefly to attend on boon-days, to ride on errands, and to drive loads,⁴ and these services of theirs are well known from records of a somewhat later time than Domesday. On the Peterborough estates they are even subjected to week-work, although of a lighter kind than their villain neighbours,⁵ but in a general way their services would rather correspond to those of the counties there is always some suspicion that they represent an admixture of Danish elements. This predominance of a class which appears emphatically as one of free peasants in Scandinavian districts points the same way as the frequent occurrence of free tenants or franklins in these same districts. Evidently both groups represent Scandinavian influence, not in the sense of some peculiar Danish or Norwegian institution, but as a result of the recent appearance on the scene of men who were too small to obtain an aristocratic position and to set up as squires—who had, in fact, to work hard for their living, and to acknowledge the superiority of powerful neighbours, but who maintained a standard of free citizenship which had all but disappeared in the purely English districts. We have more than probabilities for the inference that the state of things so characteristic of Danish England in the eleventh century was not less characteristic of Anglo-Saxon England a couple of centuries earlier. Indeed, the very expression socmen is used in a Buckinghamshire verdict¹ in the same sense, and for the same purpose, as the expression franklin in the Worcestershire verdict about churchscot. Every socman possessed of a hide has to pay one carriage-load of corn, called annona, to his parish church, and there is a provision for the case of non-performance of this duty, as in Worcestershire. This general rule, asserted by the Church, breathes the spirit of an epoch which had gone by long ago at the time of the Survey. Socmen holding hides would be difficult to find in Buckinghamshire, either T.R.W. or even T.R.E. And yet the rule was a customary one, and certainly not meant to be a dead letter. How it was applied to the villains of the eleventh century it would be difficult to say in detail, but it is clear that they were the direct representatives of the socmen from whom churchscot had to be collected. This ancient tribute, parallel to the king's gafol, does not take heed either of the manors or of their lords, but only of socmen and of their hides; it is thus directly imposed on the free peasant households; the servile peasantry is omitted, evidently because it was thought of either as settled behind the socmen or as exempted by the privileges of its lords; in any case it must have formed the exception, in the sense of a group of householders, at the time when the churchscot rule was framed. Another piece of evidence to the same effect is the transformation of the Kentish villains into Kentish socmen; it is evident that the group was formed from the same materials which appear under the rubric of villains in Domesday.¹

As in the case of freemen, Domesday discloses the constant deterioration of the status of socmen. They are the object of various encroachments. Sometimes they are transferred by force from the fee of one lord to that of another.² In a large number of cases they are joined or accommodated to a manor to which they did not belong.³

of socmen.

The size of the holdings and the position of socmen in the townships vary greatly.¹ They occur both in scattered farms and in champion-farmed country, and appear, therefore, both as holders of homesteads and separate tenements, and as members of large communities of peasants. Although socmen in scattered farms sometimes occupy a position resembling that of small squires,² as a rule they are peasants—that is, they have to cultivate their land with their own hands. In a curious Kentish entry from the district of Romney Marsh it is said, in as many words, of some socmen that they have no halls and no demesne.³ Instances when socmen are said to hold tofts and orchards occur, and the tenants would be not much more than crofters in such cases.⁴ On the other hand, a large group is formed by instances in which they cluster in villages, and appear as the occupiers of the regular holdings.¹ Townships may be exclusively composed of their tenements,² and it is quite clear that, as a rule, they till the land which they hold. Therefore it is exceptional to find villains dependent on socmen, as peasants depend on a squire.³ It may happen that some few villains, more often bordarii, are attached to large communities of socmen,⁴ which means that the help drawn by the latter from the labour of the former is only a subsidiary source of income. As a rule, the two classes appear side by side, and follow evidently the same course of husbandry,⁵

Villains.

4. The most numerous and important social class of Domesday is the villains. Their households amount, roughly, to 100,000 out of some 240,000. The most salient feature in their condition is their agricultural work: they are not only peasants, but have to perform agricultural services for their manorial lords.¹ In this sense they are emphatically rustics;² their tenements are customary tenements.³ It may happen that a village which lies in one place has to send its peasants for the performance of services to another place.⁴ But this is not sufficient to establish the definition of villainage. The rustic population would comprise the bordarii and the cotters as well as the villains. The latter are the main species of the larger genus of rustics. From several entries in Domesday we can gather that the villains were the principal shareholders of the township, the tenants among whom the ploughlands belonging to it were chiefly distributed. The Middlesex survey gives the best information in this respect,⁵ but occasional glimpses

Kentish gavelkind, and the great number of households which obtained concurrent rights under this kind of tenure. The same kind of parcelling up of rights to land may be observed in Kentish cartularies of a later period.¹ In the greater part of England villain tenements were held under the rule of single succession, either primogeniture or Borough English, and the passing of the holding to the heir was effected without sufficient regard for the claims of younger brothers and side relations.² In connexion with this assignment of holdings to villain households within the township stand the expressions pleni villani and dimidii villani, which occur now and then. The full villain is the tenant possessed of a full share in the township—a virgate, or a hide, or a half a hide. The half-villain would hold half a share, and would be taxed in a corresponding proportion.³ Villains are rarely mentioned on demesne land, and the instances when this occurs find their explanation in the fact that the home-farm is not kept separate, but is leased to the tenants.⁴ This is distinctly stated in some of the more important instances, and as a result of such an arrangement the hall may be altogether left out.⁵

The villains being the principal tenants of the manor, their land is often spoken of as the land of the tenants—the terra villanorum almost comes to be the equivalent of terra hominum. This is a pari pro toto, as there were other classes among the peasants besides the villains. Anyhow, the rights of the villains to part of the land are constantly noticed. Of course, the Domesday Survey does not go the length of discussing the nature of these rights and establishing legal barriers between villains and lords. We do not hear how far the claims of the peasants, as represented by the manorial descriptions, were based on express agreement, or on dependent right, or on custom and practice, but when the Survey enters the number of holdings, teams, or mills belonging to the villains,¹ when it gives the exact partition of geld between the demesne and the holdings of the villains,² when it notices encroachments made on the land of the villains,³ it certainly does not refer to casual arrangements which may be shifted at pleasure by the one-sided will of the lord. Some of the cases in question are worthy of a little more attention. Folkestone¹ was a large manor held by William de Arcis from the Bishop of Bayeux. In the reign of King Edward Earl Godwin held it, and it paid geld for 40 sulungs. There was land there for as many as 120 ploughs, but there were only 14 teams in demesne, and 209 villains and 63 bordarii had 45 teams between them. The great disproportion between the available ploughland and the actual cultivation of the estate had partly to be explained by encroachments on the portion of the peasants. Of the land of the villains, Hugh, son of William (Fitzwilliam), had an entire manor carved out for him. Nine sulungs had been abstracted from the villain land, and Hugh had four and a half teams, and 38 villains, with 17 bordarii, provided with 16 teams, on his submanor. Smaller fractions had been cut off for other military tenants—Walter of Appeville, Walter, son of Engelbert, Richard, &c. In Breme, Wiltshire,² the apportionment of land had also been disturbed. A series of knights were enfeoffed there. Two of them had received land out of what used to be thaneland in the reign of King Edward. But the villain settlement, represented by 32 villains and 13 bordarii with twenty teams, had lost part of its land. One Teodric had received one hide of it from the Abbot of Malmesbury, to whom the manor belonged. Two other hides of the same land had gone to Edward, one of the abbey's knights, from the King himself. The jurors sketch some of the incidents which led to the alienation of this last tenement. An English Abbot had severed it from the ownership of the Church and given it to a certain reeve (made it into reeveland?), and afterwards granted it to a thane to hold as thaneland that could not be separated from the Abbey. How it came into the hands of the King the record does not say.

The term 'demesne' may be coupled with that of terra villanorum, but in this case it would merely carry the meaning of ownership, not that of home-farm.¹ On the other hand, stress may be laid expressly on the fact that the land of the villains belongs to them—is their own.²

This is no mere manner of speech: very tangible considerations gave the distinction between the two parts of a manor a direct bearing on public interests. Not only were they separately taxed to the geld; the ancient distinction between warland and inland was still not obsolete, and therefore it was material for the Crown that the warland of the villains should be kept intact. We come, e.g., across the following significant entry in the Survey of Cornwall.¹ St. Constantine has $1\frac{1}{2}$ hides forming 4 ploughlands. In the reign of King Edward it was exempted (immunis) from all service, but since the Count (of Mortain) got the estate it has had to pay geld as villain land (terra villanorum). The opposition between the two categories could hardly be clearer expressed. The converse case is presented by a Huntingdonshire entry: 'The Abbot of St. Peter of Winchester holds Aulton, which used to be a manor of Queen Edith. There were 10 hides there in the reign of King Edward, and the villains who lived there paid geld for 5 hides. At the present time (at the time of the Survey) the abbot has 5 hides in demesne, but does not pay geld.'² This did not prevent the development of the servile theory of villainage which obtained in feudal common law, but the Domesday Survey does not yet consider the villains from that point of view. It takes them more as an economic class—the peasants, on whose work and rents both the private households of the aristocracy and the public one of the King depend.³

free
elements.

5. The basis for a servile theory is, however, already existing in some respects. The opposition between the franklin, the freeman, and the villain is often insisted upon.⁴ In one famous case the evidence of the best and most ancient men of the county is opposed to that of villains, of vile plebeians, and of reeves.¹ Not only the admixture of downright serfs settled in tributary holdings, but the whole arrangement of week-work, the burdensome rustic duties, and the harsh discipline of the hall and of the steward, gave to the condition of villainage a particularly humble setting. It was marked as a degradation when a freeman became a villain.²

And yet the redeeming features are still very noticeable in Domesday. The free elements cast into the mould assert themselves in many ways. After all, the difference between the socman and the better situated villain was not great, on the testimony of the Survey. A soce over freemen was considered, in one sense, as an extension to them of a power originally established in regard to villains.³ Among socmen there were many, as we have seen already, who were actually subjected to the same kind of exploitation and supervision as the villains, although in a lesser degree.⁴ On the other hand, some of the general customs applied to the villain class disclose in its midst a considerable element reckoned to be free.¹ Curiously enough, we find the same verdict as to churchscot which we have already seen applied to freemen in Worcestershire, and to socmen in Buckinghamshire, applied to free- and to villain-hides in another Worcestershire verdict.² These hides have to pay the same loads of corn to the Bishop of Worcester, and are liable to the same kind of forfeitures. This is surely very characteristic. We come across the same framework of Old English society arranged into hides, and the social designation of these hides leaves us the choice in this case between free and villain. The inference is not far to seek, that these expressions correspond to the free and to the socman households of the other two instances, and that the churchscot had primarily to be levied from the hides of the suitors of the hundred, the free settlers, both landowners and agricultural tenants. The very fact that the designation of villains assumes in process of time such a very general and all-embracing sense³ speaks volumes against the homogeneous origin of the class composing it. It was a common mould for various elements ranging from downright serfage to the ascription of men personally free, and to the subjection of men who might have been classified with the socmen forming so important a group in some parts of the country. Nor can there be a doubt that a most important and considerable part of the villain class is descended from the Old English ceorls, so often described as freemen in Anglo-Saxon laws. Their manorial subjection is the result of the process of formation of a military aristocracy gradually differentiated from the previously indistinct mass of freemen. In their quality of typical members of the townships the villains appear as the natural representatives of the latter in the juries called to give evidence before the Domesday Commissioners, and the composition of these juries proves to be the same as the ordinary representation of townships in the hundred and the county courts: the reeve, the priest, and six villains in the Domesday Inquests; the reeve, the priest, and four villains in the public moots.¹ The parish priest with his virgate, half-hide, or hide, appears accordingly as one of the villain shareholders of the township, although his tenement is held free of the common service on account of its special obligations.

I have been discussing the typical features of villainage in the agricultural counties of England, but it is hardly needful to mention that in forest, pastoral, or fishing districts the usual terms are applied to the working population, although its occupations would not have much to do with ploughing and other agricultural processes. As we hear of forest hides and Welsh hides, so we come across villains settled and doing work in the forest,² or as fishermen,³ or according to Welsh custom⁴—presumably connected with pastoral and forest pursuits. Individual villains might even be drawn from their ordinary occupations and be employed as artisans without losing their standing within the peasant class.¹

Bordarii.

6. It is very rare to find villains alone by themselves in a manor.² They are usually coupled with bordarii on the tenant land,³ and the numbers of these in the aggregate are not much less than those of the villains.⁴ They are also rustics, and subjected to the same kind of service as the villains, but the amount of their service is considerably less. In one instance the Domesday Survey tells us, in as many words, that the bordarii had to do work for one day in the week.⁵ This would connect them directly with the Monday-men, the Lundinarii of later 'extents', who are one group of the cottagers, of whom we hear so much both before and after the Conquest.⁶ This observation is borne out by the cases where the size of the tenements held by bordarii are given. They stand always in contrast with those of the villains, as small plots, whereas the villain holdings correspond to the large fractions of the plough-team and ploughland. The bordarii held orchards or crofts, plots of 5 acres; very rarely their tenements rise to as many as 10 or 12 acres.⁷

The term and the classification into a group are suggested, not by the membership of the township (villa), but by the occupation of a homestead—a mansura, a borda.¹ The latter was a term well known to the French barons who directed the Survey and to the Frenchmen placed on the local juries.² It appears as a peculiarity of the Domesday classification, and disappears quickly from usage, both in the law courts and in economic practice. 'Villain' becomes the one legally recognized designation for manorial subjection, while 'villains' and 'cottagers' divide the class between them as the two main economic groups. In connexion with the usual meaning of bordarius, as a crofter, we find them very often in the demesne portion of the manor.³ They were evidently in this case domanial labourers settled in cottages, and provided with a bit of land of their own, or, perhaps, small peasants who had to undertake the work on the demesne, not as week-work, but as a whole, on certain conditions. In most of these cases the home-farms assigned to the cultivation of the bordarii are small. It is quite exceptional to find a large manor settled in such a way that bordarii occupy the tenant portion¹ of the estate alone, or almost alone. It is quite common, on the other hand, to find bordarii as a group of under-tenants in settlements held by small freemen or socmen.²

The cases where bordarii are alone would imply that the crofters were provided with ploughs by the lord, or could form plough-teams of their own by joining their oxen, and it is stated exceptionally in the Survey that the bordarii have teams.³ Even in the ordinary cases where villains appear on the scene as the chief occupants of the fields, bordarii follow them in the reckoning, in a way which supposes that they had some share in the ploughlands, and possessed some oxen and agricultural implements, which enabled them to join in the cultivation. But their participation and position must have been subordinate in any case.

The reason for assigning such a considerable place to the crofters and cotters lay in the economic and social necessity for a class of smaller householders, who could assist both the lords and the larger peasants in their routine of agricultural work. The economic basis consisted in the fact that no large agricultural organization could dispense with occasional labourers and do all the work required in it by the help of its ordinary equipment. If it had to employ the same staff in the critical and in the slack periods of the economic year, one of two things would follow: either the labouring population necessary for the spring and harvest work would have to sit in comparative idleness during the winter and part of the summer, or else it would have to bear a strain beyond its strength at the critical periods of husbandry. We know that manorial management tried to help itself by an excess of boon-works at these exceptional times. But taking the tasks of the agricultural population as a whole, a demand must have always existed for extra labour at certain periods of the year, somewhat similar to the demand for hop-pickers in Kent nowadays. This kind of demand is always met to a great extent by the influx of outsiders, the Sachsengänger of Eastern Germany. Ministers' accounts of the feudal epoch show that this was to some extent the case in manorial husbandry. But the rigid local divisions of the feudal arrangement, and the imperfect conditions of intercourse, put many impediments in the way of the ebb and flow of agricultural labourers, and the economic supplement for migrations of loose 'hands' was presented in most countries of mediaeval Europe by a large class of settled labourers living in very strait circumstances in small crofts and homesteads, and ready to undertake all sorts of auxiliary work and odd jobs in the routine of village life. This appears to be the economic character of the various bordarii, bordiers, cottagers, 'husmænd', 'kötter', 'Brinksitzer' of England, France, Germany, and Scandinavian countries. There was plenty of social material for the formation of the class. It consisted chiefly of younger brothers and side relations of the peasants—the villains (Bauern)—provided with holdings. The great feature of the holding system which obtained in Western Europe is the concentration of the household shares into close units. In contrast with the gavelkind and parage systems which parcel up rights according to the growth of population, the re-divisions among the kindred practised in Celtic districts, and the periodical re-allotments of Russia, the prevailing mediaeval arrangement of Teutonic Europe tended to sacrifice the interests of the plurality of claimants to the economic efficiency of the agrarian units—of the Hof, the Hufe, the mansus, the virgate or bovaté, and the 'odal'. Superfluous claims were cut off or bought out, and, as a result, a large percentage of the population was thrown out into minor occupations and side settlements. For a time one of the principal exits left open for bachelors (Haistalds, Hages-tolzen) was settling in crofts and cots around the main stock of the peasants.¹ The working of these economic and social processes comes to a head in the formation of the class of crofters and cottagers represented by bordarii and cottarii in England.

of serfs.

I have dwelt especially on this side of the development, because it has hardly been realized sufficiently by most writers on the subject. But it was supplemented from another side by the influx of settled labourers of servile origin. It may be supposed that in most cases the conversion of a slave into a serf of the glebe was effected by planting a servile household on a small plot of land, and subjecting it to the fluctuating requirements of manorial husbandry, without such definite limits as to customary employment as those which obtained in the case of the more cumbersome and costly arrangements of the large peasant farms. Sometimes the crofts of the bordarii might grow into holdings of the higher type; in other cases, on the contrary, they might multiply as cottages. But anyhow they presented one of the steps by which the numerous slave contingents of ancient times advanced towards a more protected and economically advantageous position.

Cottagers.

7. A somewhat puzzling feature of Domesday terminology is the occurrence of cottagers by the side of the 'bordiers'. The Survey mentions cottarii,² cotmen,³ and *cotsets*⁴ in different parts of the country, and the members of these groups make up a considerable class. They even occur in the same entries with bordarii, and are distinguished from them. These facts are not difficult to explain however. Cotman, cotset is the vernacular designation for the class, and therefore its cropping up is only natural. The Norman Survey uses the French term constantly, however, and even makes attempts to co-ordinate both terms in order to express shades of meaning in regard to the size of the plots assigned to the various crofters.¹ This is carried very far, and distinctions are attempted on this line between cotarii and cotsets.² There may be other elements underlying such minute subdivisions, e.g., the wish to distinguish between cottagers of ancient standing and settlers provided with new homesteads and an outfit. But it is neither possible nor necessary to trace all these shades and niceties in detail. The principal facts are clear enough. They consist in the grouping of the peasantry into two great classes: the holders of the regular farms and tenements in the fields, and the crofters and cottagers surrounding the main stock of the agricultural population.

Besides these two main streams leading to the formation of the crofter class, it has to be noticed that the aristocratic evolution culminating in the Conquest had, as one of its consequences, the breaking up of a great number of full peasant farms, and the eviction of large numbers of free peasants, with a corresponding increase in the number of crofters and cottagers on their precarious small tenements. Many facts of this kind come directly under our notice in the Survey.³ Sometimes it may be found that this parcelling-up of farms and dispossession of substantial peasant tenants coincides with a certain growth of the demesne farm¹ supported by cottagers work. In a few cases the increase in the number of cottagers seems partly due to the disappearance of serfs,² as well as to a lowering in the status of peasants.

Censores.

In some cases, again, the bordarii must have held leaseholds which it was impossible to classify as ordinary villain holdings, because they were let for rackrents. In this sense the term bordarius would correspond to that of censarius or ensor, and a comparison between Domesday and the Burton Cartulary shows that the transition did actually take place: the older record uses bordarius where the later one speaks of ensores. The numbers do not coincide, and the twelfth-century Cartularies show a considerable increase of these rent-holdings, as is only natural in view of the general progress achieved in the 25-40 years since 1086. But the place of the bordarii as a group is clearly taken by the ensores group in the twelfth century,³

and this fact throws a reflected light on the meaning of bordarius in Domesday. The constant occurrence of the latter may explain why ensor and ensarius occur so seldom.¹

8. At the bottom of the social ladder of the Domesday Servi. Survey we find a class of unfree servants—serfs or slaves (servi). Their total number is not very large—some 25,000, and there arises, at the very beginning, the question whether we have to reckon in this case with households or with persons. Serfs have no holdings or tenements, in the proper sense of the word. This is not only a theoretical inference from their general status, but a fact rendered clear by their connexion with the demesne. The Survey, indeed, enumerates them sometimes as one of a series of social groups on the estates, and in this case it may mention them in the same breath with villains and bordarii.² But in more carefully drawn up descriptions it places them on the demesne,³ and keeps them quite distinct from the other tenants and the land of the tenants (terra hominum). And yet I hesitate to construe the Domesday entries as referring to heads of population. This would be quite out of keeping with all the other items of the Survey, and would lead to a very strange result: serfdom would seem to have almost entirely disappeared in many parts of the country, and to be represented by one or two persons only on a number of estates where it does occur. This would be startling indeed, some fifty years after the Danish invasions. I think the serfs entered in the record are those who held ministeria, definite offices connected with the estates or farms; both the members of their families and stray personal attendants must have been omitted. A difficulty presents itself in the fact that female servants¹ (ancillae) are often mentioned, but it looks insuperable only at first glance; there must have been many ministeria confided to women in a well-ordered estate, and the disappointing feature in this case is rather that offices of this kind are not alluded to more often. The positive reasons for my suggestion, besides the above observations, consist in the fact that in some cases the servile labourers on the demesne appear more specially as ploughmen (bovarii). They are designated as such in one or two cases,² and in a number of other instances we are led to some conclusion of the kind by the symmetrical correspondence between the number of teams and of serfs on the demesne.³ Two, and perhaps four in some cases, seem to be reckoned to each plough as a rule. This average would be a reasonable one, as there must have been at least a double personnel to serve the demesne ploughs on well-ordered estates. The foregoing observations appear as a probable solution of the question in regard to some counties, but it would not do to restrict the employment of serfs to the office of ploughmen. They may have acted as herdsmen, keepers, artisans in other places, and this would explain why the numbers vary so much and go on increasing towards the west. Evidently many more serfs were kept in Devonshire, Dorset, Gloucestershire, to fill the household offices of the lord's farm in the west of England, than in the east, where they may have been entrusted to hired labourers or tenants, especially bordarii, for a certain consideration, or for the remission of ordinary week-work.¹

As an exception, serfs may appear connected with fractions of plough-teams.² Perhaps the terminology may be somewhat deceptive in this case, and alludes to ploughmen like the above, but even if tenants were meant, it would not be strange, on the face of it, to find such settled serfs, 'serfs chasés,' as they were called in France. The only wonder would be why the record should call them serfs in such cases, and not bordarii, cottagers, or even villains, according to the size and nature of their tenement. But of such terminological inconsistencies there are too many in the Survey to allow us to make strict inferences from them.

In the treatment of serfs by the Domesday commissioners and jurors, we have one of the many instances of the misleading character of inferences based on a literal adherence to the statements of mediaeval documents without proper consideration of the perspective of their presentation of society. Should we follow implicitly the guidance of thirteenth-century jurists, we might suppose that almost the entire peasant population of the England of their time was of servile condition.³ If we stand by the Domesday rubrics we may come to the conclusion that serfage was quickly dying out, and had all but disappeared in several of the shires at the time of the Conquest. If we turn to the Old English charters we shall have to recognize that, up to the eleventh century, slavery and manumission from slavery are playing a most important part in social life. Without even referring to such early instances as that of the cultivation of Selsey, which presents a large colony of downright serfs (theows),⁴ it is sufficient to call attention to the constant references to slave-born men¹ to show that serfdom was a very important item in the social organization of the eleventh century. Although the incidents of the life of this lowest order of society are to a great extent concealed from us by the contemptuous disregard of lords and clerks, and by the peculiar terminology of the sources, the contradictory data of the Codex Diplomaticus, the Domesday Survey, and the thirteenth-century plea rolls have to be reconciled somehow. In reality, these data ought to dovetail into each other, and not to contradict each other.

The solution of the problem has to be sought chiefly in the rearrangement of enormous numbers of serfs according to a new classification in the eleventh century, and the legal consequences drawn from this classification by the rising Common Law. The descendants of the slaves (theows) of older Saxon custom are distributed in two distinct classes in the eleventh century—they appear as serfs, domestic and home-farm servants, and as geburs or settled labourers who have to be looked for among the bordarii and the villains of Domesday Book. This is indicated by the heavy services imposed on the gebur according to the Rectitudines.² From an interesting entry of the Medhamstead memoranda we gather that on the estates of the Danish Midlands, of which Northamptonshire may be regarded as a standard example, a certain number of agricultural labourers were connected with the regular stock of provisions and cattle on the farm. Both men and women are mentioned, and the entry as to the latter indicates that we have to do with a servile population—they would correspond to the ancillae, the dairymaids, and the artisans of whom we occasionally hear in the Domesday Survey. But the numbers of the labourers are so large, and they are so carefully distinguished from a lower group called young men, that it would hardly do to regard them merely as farm labourers settled in the lord's demesne.¹ The work of which they are worthy would naturally seem to be week-work and other incidents of customary rustic labour. A corroboration of this view may be found in the frequent allusions to settled serfs made in eleventh-century charters and wills.²

These instances form a transition from the old status of the personally enslaved theows to the serfage of the glebe, on which the law books and the law records of the feudal age lay stress. Not that any inference as to the general derivation of villains from servile condition would be warranted in any way, but by the side of the ceorls of free origin, who certainly form one of the constitutive elements of villainage, we have to make room for the servile labourers settled on dependent land, the 'geburs who sit on gafol-land', of Anglo-Saxon laws and charters.³

Freedmen. In the Anglo-Danish treaties, by the side of the ceorls settled on gafol-land, leysings (freedmen) are to be found, and manumission is often alluded to in early English charters¹ and inscriptions on holy books belonging to the churches.² There can be no doubt that there was a mighty current of emancipation which, though it did not do away with the economic dependence of the serfs, placed them on a better personal footing than that of pure slaves, and, among other things, must have provided them with wergelds. It is curious to notice the reflection of this process in Domesday Book. It is not adequately represented, in so far as a great number of freedmen were certainly included in the bordarii and in the villani class, with hardly any indication as to their former status or the act of manumission.³ But the casual resolve of several sets of jurors frequently advises us of the existence of a class of *coliberti*⁴ which discloses its origin in its name. It is difficult to say why the shorter and simpler term liberti is not used, and why coliberti appears instead—perhaps we may trace in it an indication of manumission by groups as distinguished from individual emancipation. There may also be a reminiscence of the Germanic ge appearing in such composite words as gebur or geneat. The relation of the coliberti to the estates on which they are found varies a great deal. They are kept distinct from the serfs, villains, and freemen, but they appear sometimes in close connexion with the home-farm,⁵ while in other instances they are found together with villani, socmen, or bordarii on the tenant land of the manor.¹ In the first case the terminological distinction is easily explained: we have two classes of farm labourers before us—those of servile condition and the freedmen. In the second case the separate mention of coliberti is somewhat more difficult to interpret: the material position may be identical either with that of the villani or with that of the bordarii group, and yet they are held apart. Is it because of recent manumission involving a certain contrast between older settlers and newly colonized freedmen? Or are these peculiarities in their mode of holding land and performing services? It is impossible to give a definite answer to such queries, and perhaps both eventualities have to be considered. However this may be, we certainly find the coliberti burdened with rents² and services³ analogous to those of the other groups of peasantry. What is more, there are curious indications of a close connexion between the Low Latin coliberti and the early English buri. The latter term, so common in Old English documents, occurs very rarely in Domesday Book.⁴ But it is definitely equated there to coliberti in one instance, and there can hardly be a doubt that in another case the same sort of equation was meant.⁵ These indications,

Summary. A few points may be added by way of summary.

1. The distinctions between thanes, liberi homines, and socmen are rather in the degrees of freedom than in the essence of status.

2. Villains appear as a composite group in which both servile and free elements are clearly traceable.

3. Domesday Book testifies to a rapid decay of the free classes.

4. The bordarii group was largely recruited from freedmen.

5. The extinction of slavery is to be attributed both to the influence of religious views and to economic conditions.

LAND AND PEOPLE: GENERAL SURVEY

AT the close of our prolonged study of social institutions we may attempt to gather the threads of our investigation and to present a synthetic view of the subject. Such a view must strive to bring clearness and co-ordination into a discussion which in its details has constantly had to reckon with obscurities, contradictions, and gaps. A reader who has had the patience to follow the argument of the book will know in what respects the rough-and-ready dogmatism of such a general survey has to be supplemented by reservations and exceptions. But at this last stage it is no use encumbering a summary with them. We must try not to describe every single institution, but to sketch their mutual relations and organic interdependence. Scope of survey.

We have to start from the fact that the social organization of the eleventh century does not fit into one system, but presents a rather incoherent combination of two—of the feudal system and of another which, for want of a better word, we may call the territorial. The latter proceeds from an earlier tribal arrangement; but we need not concern ourselves much now with these beginnings, which fall into earlier ages and ought to be studied rather in connexion with the general history of tribal Europe than with the history of the Commonwealth of England.

The feudal system is predominant on the surface. Its most striking expression is the political and economic sway of a class whose social relations are adjusted on the basis of contract: a contract of personal service resulting in military, clerical, or economic obligations. In the localities the mainstay of the system is the Manor. Domesday Book Feudal

shows this institution in full vigour, although not yet in the completeness and legal precision of a later period. The principal element of an eleventh-century manor is the lord, the representative of feudal aristocracy in the place. The manor appears in one sense as the district surrounding the lord's hall. From another point of view it may be said that the manor is a mansion and district in which there lives a lord, a personal follower and officer of the King. Or again, it may be termed an estate serving as a material basis to local political authority. These self-evident propositions account for many particulars in the evidence, and dispose of some interpretations which might otherwise have suggested themselves. Neither the fiscal nor the purely economic explanation of the manor turns out to be sufficient: the lord is not primarily a person responsible for taxes, nor merely a landowner: he is a man in authority over a district connected with his estate, and this authority he wields in consequence of a contract of feudal service. Manorial lordship was in full growth in Anglo-Saxon times, but the rights derived from it were very much subdivided and shifting. Besides, manorial authority had not yet succeeded in disentangling itself from the influence of territorial institutions. It is manifest to what extent the Norman Conquest and the formation of Common Law contributed to consolidate manorial organizations and to make them prevalent.

Free
tenants.

Under the sway of the lord two classes of men appear within the manor: free tenants and subject rustics—villains, bordarii, &c. The presence of both these elements is usual, but not necessary. In a great many cases the rustics appear alone on the spot and, as a matter of fact though not of principle, their existence in the manor is of vital importance, as the whole structure is mainly supported by their work and dues. But a manor may consist of freemen only, even in the time of King William, or of free tenants in such majority that the presence of a few rustics did not alter its character.¹ Such cases are rare, but their value is considerable, because they show that the servile status of the tenantry was not of the essence of the institution. An aristocratic lord may be placed over freeholders as well as over villains, and it does not require a very keen sight to notice that such lordships were more common in Saxon times than after the Conquest.¹

Another characteristic trait of the free tenants of Domesday Book is that a large number of them are, as it were, attached to the manors by a rather slight tie: many have been added or accommodated to their manors in consequence of the Conquest. This refers us to a time when they stood entirely outside, and lived their life as members of the territorial and not of the feudal subdivisions.

In the theory of Common Law, freeholders were tenants by free contract and therefore certain of their tenure. This is demonstrably a later legal fiction framed to meet a situation when legal protection in the King's Courts was refused to villains in their dealings with their lords. The theory would not fit even the state of things described in the Domesday Survey: the great majority of liberi homines and socmen mentioned in that record derive their position from recognized social status, and not from agreement or grant. And if we look beyond Domesday we find various social strata of ceorls and free Scandinavians as predecessors of later free tenants and socmen. Their condition had nothing to do with contract, but was based on free ownership under the King or under the authority of magnates who had received special powers from the King.

These considerations throw light not only on the history of freeholders, but, indirectly, on that of the largest class of the population—the villains and their satellites, the bordarii and cottagers. This wide group appears unified in feudal practice by agricultural service and the denial of protection in the Royal Courts as regards the lord. The uncertainty of tenure and service is the legal result of the latter feature. But what appears unified and subjected to similar rules in Common Law is seen to be worked out of different elements by the action of convergent forces. From beneath comes the gradual transformation of slavery into serfdom, partial emancipation coupled with a position as subject cultivators which enabled the serfs to claim for their own use a considerable part of their time and of the products of their labour, as well as the plot on which they had been settled. Their tenure was precarious in law, but well established in custom, and in the long run custom cannot fail to produce legal results. From above there goes on the degradation of numerous free-born ceorls, not only in consequence of violence, encroachment, and oppressive patronage, but as a result of slow but sure social processes—subdivision of property, loans, the economic attraction of better-situated neighbours. Material helplessness and agricultural dependence had set in for many of them long before the Norman lawyers devised and carried out the doctrine that the King has no need to interfere in the relations between a manorial lord and his villains. I will not repeat here what I have tried to show in another book, namely, that it was not without hesitation and contradictions that this denial of jurisdiction was applied in Common Law. It may be sufficient to mention that the most important exception preserved in later law—the Ancient Demesne condition—turns out to have roots extending far into Anglo-Saxon antiquity. It is a narrowed and technically circumscribed application of the general rule that Royal grants of territory ought not to have as a result a change in the condition of the King's free subjects. In this broad formulation the rule was equitable, but inefficient: in the narrower form imparted to it by feudal lawyers it was consistently enforced.

manors.

Taking the manor as a unit, and comparing its actual manifestations in the feudal age with those marked T. R. W. and T. R. E. in Domesday Book, we are struck by their disparity. By the side of very small estates with a few cultivators are to be seen large self-governing townships under administrative patronage ; by the side of jurisdictional franchises, fairly developed capitalistic undertakings. The most common type presents, undoubtedly, a combination between a home-farm of moderate size and a circle of rustic tenures supporting it by service and rents. But in order to understand the growth even of this usual type one has to attend to the other varieties as well : they show clearly what distinct elements went to the composition of the manorial groups.

Beneath the individualistic network of feudal rights a system of territorial organization is clearly discernible. It is of more ancient date than the feudal arrangements, and it has by no means lost its vitality and importance even in the feudal age. We need not trace its beginnings in the settlements of various tribes on English soil. It is sufficient for our purpose to note that the divisions of shires, hundreds, and wapentakes stretch all over the kingdom as a complete organization for the management of military, fiscal, and judicial affairs. The primary cell in this organization is not the manor but the township : it is called upon to perform various administrative duties—to deliver evidence at inquests, to catch and watch thieves, to mend roads, to contribute in keeping up bridges and walls, to assess and levy taxes, to witness transactions, &c. In some cases townships had to be constituted artificially to meet these divers administrative requirements, but there can be no doubt that the main stock of English townships was of natural growth and not constituted at pleasure by higher authority.

The township.

Nor did they exist mainly for the sake of performing judicial and administrative service to the King : their everyday life and most vital interest lay in the management of their own affairs. Their yearly routine of such affairs was a very full and complicated one, especially in districts where champion-farming prevailed. Even in regions with scattered settlements the management of pasture and wood recalled to the mind of the individual farmers that neither they nor their lords were quite free to do what they liked with a considerable part of the land used by them. In open-field country the restrictive and regulating influence of the township extended to all the principal operations of husbandry—to the laying out and apportioning of the arable, to the rotation of crops, the regulation of seasons, the order of ploughing, sowing, hay-harvest and corn-harvest, to the division and allotment of meadows, the erection and removal of fences, the framing and keeping up of numberless rules in regard to agrarian limits and strips, to roads and right of way, to the use of cattle on the pastures, to stinting the commons in various directions, to responsibility for trespassing, &c. This very complicated and very restrictive system was spread all over England as well as in other countries of Western Europe, and its roots are certainly to be sought not in individualistic, but in communalistic notions, which even the individualistic law of feudalism was powerless to remove. Its history goes right back to the tribal period, which provides the best explanation for this communalistic side of rural life in the subjection of the individual to tribal rules and kinship organizations.

Peculiarities of English village community.

It is not enough, however, to note the strong infusion of communalistic elements in English township life. There are several features which give to the village community a very peculiar stamp, and explain why it could combine with institutions based seemingly on an entirely different conception of right. The English rural community, as well as the German and Scandinavian, never aimed at a complete subjection of the individuals constituting the union to the rule of this union, or at the exclusion of all private interests. On the contrary, individuals were left very free to do what they liked with their labour and to start on private enterprises. They could freely leave the unions if they wanted to, could use their private earnings in the village if they liked, and could even start on private cultivation if there was room and they had the means. Whatever obstacles may have existed in all these respects came largely from feudal authority and not from the community itself, and even the feudal lord mostly contented himself with claiming dues and fines in such cases, without putting insurmountable hindrances in the way. There is no trace of periodical re-divisions of the arable, although there is distinct evidence that arable could be re-alloted according to the original shares on exceptional occasions, and meadows are sometimes subjected to re-partition by lot even to the present day. Although in this way there was a great scope for the development of individual fortunes, and the Germanic communities never tackled the problem of regulating the interdependence between population and soil, they certainly faced the other problem of constituting a union of economically efficient shares to which the rights and uses of rural occupation should be apportioned. The champion husbandry of England, Germany, Denmark, and Sweden cannot be thought of without a system of graduated holdings to support and direct it. The hides, yard-gangs, oxgangs, bóls, ottings, hufen, are different forms of one and the same main institution—the normal holdings sufficient for the support of peasant families on different rungs of the social ladder of a village. To these normal tenements rights and claims are apportioned according to certain scales.

As soon as we reach a standpoint from which all such facts become connected and related to each other, it becomes evident that the village community in question is neither free nor servile in its essence. Both the open-field system and the township combine equally well with free and servile institutions: they are economic and social arrangements suggested by the nature of the agricultural problems and the state of culture, but they cannot be derived exclusively from one or the other stratum of society.

One more observation has to be made in connexion with the township and the open-field system in the Anglo-Danish regions of England. These provinces are conspicuous by the large number of small freemen. At the same time there are no traces of clan or kinship-settlements. The members of the townships appear as neighbours, not as relations. Altogether, it seems clear that tribal ties did not play an important part in those districts of England conquered and re-colonized by bands of warriors organized as military hosts and voluntary guild associations. This is not to be wondered at in view of the late period when the Scandinavian invasions took place, and their character as the conquests of pirates. Nevertheless, the characteristic features of township organization are not less noticeable in Lincolnshire or Leicestershire than they are in Sussex or Berkshire, in Jutland or in Skone. Evidently, apart from the fact that the Vikings found an English rural organization in full working order, we have to reckon with general conceptions in their midst very similar to those of the conquered English. In fact, it is from half-Danish provinces like Northamptonshire, Norfolk, and Lincolnshire, that some of our best evidence in regard to the open-field system and the apportionment of rights to shares or holdings does come. The notices as to tofts, to one-man lands, the carucates as ten-man lands, the dales and stikkas of the intermixed arable, come from this region. Thus the differences between English and Scandinavian arrangements turn out to be differences in degree and period, not in the essence of institutions.

Private
estates.

If I lay stress on these points, I do not wish to imply in the least that private property and private estates did not exist and did not play a very important part in social evolution. The Domesday Survey and Anglo-Saxon charters are full of evidence concerning separate estates, acquired and exploited for private use; and free from the manifold restrictions imposed by village communities on their members. Nor was a class of unfree labourers wanting to supply the work necessary for such private estates. But neither the private estate nor the servile class can be considered as exclusively or even chiefly characteristic of early English land tenure. The problem of the social origins of England cannot be solved unless we take into account both currents of development—that proceeding from the private estate with its unfree labourers and that connected with the township, as a union of peasant shareholders. Only by studying both elements can we obtain results which will enable us to bring the social evolution of England into harmony with that of the Romanized West of Europe on the one hand, and with Germanic and Scandinavian culture on the other.

APPENDIX X

BY-LAWS

I do not intend to discuss the question of township by-laws at any length, as I have already had occasion to treat of this subject in The Growth of the Manor. It seems clear to me that we cannot disregard the late but detailed evidence of the working of champion farming in modern times and in the later Middle Ages, and that we must connect it with the copious material supplied by early English documents as to the widely spread practice of open-field cultivation, and with similar data from foreign sources, especially from Germany and Scandinavia. What I want to do now is to adduce some interesting particulars concerning open-field husbandry and its organization, drawn from different periods. This has to a certain extent been done in Nasse's famous pamphlet on the English Village Community (Ueber die mittelalterliche Feldgemeinschaft in England), but the subject may be followed up a great deal further. In fact, there can be no doubt that a diligent study of Court Rolls and other local records will provide a continuous series of valuable illustrations. One might almost begin at the present time, as the lot-meadows of Yarnton and Kidlington still show the apportionment of strips in shifting combinations to the members of ancient unions of neighbours.¹ The practices are substantially the same as those which obtained in the well-known case of Aston and Cote (Giles, History of Bampton; Gomme, Village Community, 162; Villainage in England, 392); Maitland's criticism, in 'Survivals of Archaic Communities' (Law Quart. Rev. ix, 216), seems rather rationalistic, and hardly does justice to this case.

I will, however, chiefly draw my illustrations from documents describing the arrangements previous to the enclosures of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. W. Marshall, in his books on the Rural Economy of England, has been often appealed to, and he gives indeed most valuable information about open-field practices. Those examples are of especial interest which contain references to ancient terms and institutions, and therefore help to connect modern customs with their early antecedents. In Marshall's description of the Vale of Pickering, Yorks, we find, e.g., the following interesting remarks. He states, to begin with, that manorial courts are still of practical importance even in places where copyhold and free-rent tenures have all but disappeared, because they provide for the cleansing of rivulets and common sewers, the repair of roads, the sufficiency of ring fences, the estimation of damages by impounded cattle, the stocking of commons, and the removal of nuisances. These matters require frequently the interposition of a jury, who in places where they are still empanelled are considered not only as judges of the general welfare of the manor, but are frequently called in as arbiters of private differences.² Coming to the agrarian aspect of the country, he says: 'In my own remembrance more than half the Vale lay open. . . . In the beginning of the present century [eighteenth], the immediate township of Pickering remained in its ancient uninclosed state. Having been thought too large to be laid out conveniently as one township, it had been judiciously split into two divisions by a natural line, a considerable brook which runs through it. On each side of the brook lay a suite of common fields, three in number, for the unvarying round of wheat, &c., beans, &c., fallow. These common fields were respectively divided into oxgangs, evenly scattered over every field, so that each occupier might have an equal or similar share of good and bad, near and distant land; the houses being in this, as in every other common-field township, placed in the town. Each field consisted of twenty-two oxgangs, each of which on one side of the township contained twenty-four acres, on the other twelve acres. Consequently the six fields contained 2,376 acres. Each division had likewise its common meadow. Other portions of the township were laid out in stinted pastures, wholly appendant to the common-field lands, each oxgang of which having a right to a limited number of gaits for cows and working oxen. The remainder of the township, containing many thousand acres, was common. . . . Within memory it seems an attempt was made to stint them, but the regulation lasted only one year. Before and since that time they have been, in the strictest sense of the word, unstinted commons for all kinds of commonable stock, excepting sheep and working oxen, which last were, by the by-laws of the township, confined to the stinted pastures and the upland commons, and the former to the upland commons only.¹

Another interesting and rather peculiar case is described in Lincolnshire. 'Lord Exeter has property on the Lincoln side of Stamford that seems held by some tenure of ancient custom among the farmers, resembling the rundale of Ireland. The tenants divide and plough up the commons, and then lay them down to become common again, and shift the open-fields from hand to hand in such a manner that no man has the same land two years together; which has made such confusion that were it not for ancient surveys, it would now be impossible to ascertain the property (cf. my Gloucestershire). In regard to commons a similar custom prevails in Devonshire and Cornwall. And with respect to common fields the same practice under the name of run-rig formerly was common in the Highlands of Scotland.'²

I am indebted to the kindness of Mr. A. Ballard for having been able to use three very interesting Court Rolls of the manor of Great Tew, Oxon, dated 20th October, 1756, 22nd October, 1759, and 23rd October, 1761. For a discussion on them I will refer the reader to a paper to be published in a forthcoming issue of the Economic Quarterly Review. Though late, these rolls present exceptionally full and precise information about the management of an open-field township. The orders (by-laws) were made by juris elected from among the homage. Modern practices in the way of complicated rotations of crops and of the cultivation of sainfoin do not detract from the exceedingly archaic methods of champion-farming described in these documents. One of the most remarkable traits revealed by them is the survival of the hide-system in the arrangement of the fields, a fact exactly parallel to the oxgangs of Pickering.

From a book little known, The History and Antiquities of Gainsborough (com. Lincoln), by Adam Stark, London, 1817 (pp. 160-3), I should like to quote some clauses of a curious set of by-laws, ordered by a body called the Forraynes, that is, by the tenants of the foreign or rural portion of Gainsborough, kept clearly apart from the borough (or Portman) section of the township. These by-laws were entered in a Court Leet held on May Day in 1601, and are headed Paynes [penalties] made by the Forraynes.

2. 'We lay in payne that the constables make Leygate and the fences, Moorgate and the fences, and the bridges to them belonging, before Lady-day in Lent, and so keep them, in payne of every default—ii (s.)

3. If any man keep more sheep upon his stint, to put them away before our Lady-day in Lent, upon payne of every five sheep—6 (d.)

4. That every man gripp his lands in the corne fields so oft as need shall require, in payne—os. 4d.

5. That every man mowe his thistles in his fallow-field so oft as need requireth, in payne of every land—4d.

6. That noe man keep or teather any horse in the ox-pasture, or in the Pitt-Hills, but for every ox-gang one, and that he keep nor teather any mares that have foles, in payne—4d.

7. That every man make his fence in the South Sands [corr. lands] and North Sands, at such tyme as men sowe, and having warning given by the furman, and soe keepe them untill harvest be done, in payne—12d.

9. That none gleane corne untill the furlough be led away, and none to gleane but the poore, and that none of Morton shall gleane but in the North Sands, upon payne—4d.

10. That noe man put any milkes on the North Marsh, or in Humble Carre, but every man of his owne, in payne—12*d*.

11. That every man having any headland in the fields shall plowe them no farther than usually they have been plowed upon—5*d*.

12. We lay in payne that none of Morton keepe or put any swyne, geese, or other beastes upon any grounds belonging to Gainsburgh, upon payne—10*d*.

13. We lay in payne that noe man or his servant shall keepe their horses, or oxen, in the Belks [balks], Pitt-Hills, or cornfields in the night, in payne—20*d*.

14. That the perso^{ns} are to let their lands called Reddings, Stannowe, two closes beyond the Belks, and one in North Sands, lie open after the crops are taken off, in payne—39*s*.

15. It is layd in payne that the yearly furman shall make and sufficiently maintain, yearly and every year continually, a bridge, passable both for horse and beasts, at all useful and fitting tymes, into Humble Carre untill it be layed in, in payne—20*s*.

16. Wee doe lay in payne that Sir Willoughby Hickman, Bart., shall betwixt this and our Lady-day next, make a sufficient fence betwixt Leafields and the lordship of Gainsburgh, and for not doing the same we doe amerce him 39 sh., and that the said summe shall be by the Burgrave taken out of the estreats of the aforesaid Sir Willoughby Hickman, Bart., and by him payed to the overseers of the poore, and by them to be distributed according to their discretion—39*s*.'

If we turn to earlier Court Rolls, we find curious differences in the enrolment of agrarian business in different manors. In some cases there are a good many indications as to a treatment of these concerns corresponding to what we have seen in full application in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries; in other cases no notice whatever is taken of by-laws, open-field practices, nor even of agrarian trespasses. Is there any reason to think that these contrasts correspond to a deep-rooted opposition between the husbandry of one class of manors and that of another? I do not think any person who has studied Court Rolls will maintain that. Sometimes the contrasts mentioned may be observed in places which lie close by each other and are situated in exactly similar economic conditions. The explanation must be evidently sought in the fact that manorial officers enrolled agrarian entries in some cases and contented themselves with enrolling conveyancing and police business in other cases. And the earlier the rolls taken up, the thinner is found the stream of agrarian entries, although there is indeed no reason to suppose that the manors and townships of the thirteenth century were less active in regulating rural affairs than the villages of the eighteenth. And then comes a time—the first half of the thirteenth century and earlier—when Court Rolls themselves cease, and we do not hear either of agrarian by-laws, or of manorial conveyancing, or of the police jurisdiction of Court-leets. And yet we know that all these matters did not begin in the later years of King Henry III. It is, I think, a valuable lesson in historical perspective. We must not jump to the conclusion that an object is small because it looks small in the distance. It would be imprudent to assume that it ceases to exist when it disappears from our horizon. Indirect evidence may have to go a long way in similar cases.

So much as a general estimate of Court Rolls evidence. And now let us look at some characteristic examples of it. Even when agrarian by-laws are not enrolled as such they may be referred to for the sake of the fines (poenae) inflicted under them. Or else penal clauses may be inserted in a casual way, although in other respects the agrarian arrangements may be settled by word of mouth at the moots, or left to the orders of a peasant jury. In the soke of Grantham, Lincs., e.g., we often find entries like the following:

‘Impositum est quod nullus inhabitantium permittat porcos suos ad largum fore ac cursicare in le garthes siue clausura vicinorum post discessum siue ¹ ortum solis sub pena pro qualibet vice sic visus ² 12 d. Et dicunt quod nullus effugat cattalla sua laxata per separales campos a festo Apostolorum Philippi et Jacobi usque ad exitum Authumni sub pena qualibet vice 6 d., et quod omnes antique pene in prioribus visis facte remaneant usque ad proximum visum, etc.’ (Record Office, Court Roll 155/44, m. 1; 11-16 Eliz. 1568-1574.)

There is at the Record Office an interesting set of rolls of the manors of the Abbey of Ramsey; they range from the reign of Henry III to that of Henry VIII. Here are some extracts from copies made for me by Miss K. S. Martin. I venture to call attention by means of italics to some of the more important points.

m. 8 d. (Chateris). Iurati dicunt . . . quod Iohannes Pegge de Somersham falcauit iniuste infra ladam de Crowlode, ubi illi de Somersham nunquam falcauerunt. Ideo etc. (xl d).

I give one more set of extracts from the Court Rolls of the Derbyshire manors of the Duchy of Lancaster, which seems interesting on account of the sharp division of the manorial court into a free and a bond section.

Duchy of Lancaster Court Rolls 45/325 (4-6 Ric. II).

Inquisitio natiuorum presentat quod . . . item R. W. superonerat communam pasture cum xx bidentibus.

Duchy of Lancaster Court Rolls 48/567 (1-4 Henry VI).

m. 3. Inquisitio liberorum iurata presentat quod . . . J. W. de C. superonerat communam pasture cum lxxx bidentibus . . . et quod R. S. fecit transgressionem in le Fryth cum c bidentibus. Ideo ipsi in misericordia.

m. 4 d. Inquisitio bondorum iurata presentat quod N. de N. fodebat turbas et petes in communi ubi non habet communam, ideo etc. Et quod idem N. occupat communam cum aueriis suis ubi non habet communam etc. Et quod villata de C. occupat communam ibidem in le Fryth cum aueriis et bidentibus suis ubi non habent communam. Et quod eadem villata fodebat turbas et bruera ibidem sine licentia firmarii. Ideo ipsi in misericordia. Et quod I. V. capellanus superonerat communam tenencium cum v bidentibus ubi non habet communam. Et quod uicarius ecclesie de Bradburn occupat communam similiter cum cc bidentibus. Ideo ipsi in misericordia.

m. 6 d. Inquisitio liberorum iurata presentat quod I. S. de S. includit i parcelлам terre vocatam Frischelyleye ad nocumentum tenencium. Ideo ipse in misericordia. Et quod I. C. de eadem includit i parcelлам terre vocatam le More ad nocumentum tenencium Regis. Ideo in misericordia.

Duchy of Lancaster Court Rolls 57/622 (2-3 Eliz.).

m. 3 d. (Bonteshall). Inquisitio . . . iurata dicit et presentat super sacramentum suum quod . . . non fecerunt rupturas suas in le Kyrke medoo, Hartstall, et le Howgh iuxta ordinacionem curie et consensum aliorum vicinorum.

Duchy of Lancaster C. R. 57/626 (8-9 Eliz.).

Some extant rolls of Wirkesworth Socage illustrate the same course of agriculture, e.g.:—

Duchy of Lanc. C. R. 49/589 (2-3 Henry VIII).

m. 1 d. Quod H. B. et R. B. forisfecerunt penam de xiid. eo quod non fecerunt rupturam prout iniunctum. . . .

Et pena posita est A. B., [et] abbati de B., quod amoveant oues suas quia superonerant communem pasturam, et amoveantur citra proximam magnam curiam sub pena forisfaciendi prout patet (xiii s. iv d., xl s.).

m. 5 (Melburne). Et quod I. C., W. K., R. H. iun., W. C., H. K., et R. T. posuerunt animalia sua super terras seminatæ antequam grana fuerint inde asportata contra ordinacionem curie (six fines of iv d. each).

Duchy of Lanc. C. R. 50/620 (4-6 Philip and Mary).

m. 5 (Malloc). (Iurati) . . . dicunt . . . quod H. A. etc. non annulauerunt porcos suos secundum ordinacionem curie, ideo ipsi sunt in misericordia.
